Lloyd George Scores Govt. For Rejecting Reconstruction Plan

Mr. David Lloyd George, wartime Prime Minister of England, on July 22, replied to the Government's statement rejecting his scheme of national reconstruction, and he quoted a letter from Prime Minister Baldwin which accompanied a copy of the statement sent to him on July 19. After saying that the Govenment had completed their examination of the memorandum originally submitted to the Cabinet and of the revised memorandum which Mr. Lloyd George sent after his discussions with the Cabinet Committee, Mr. Baldwin, according to the Times London, added:—

The Cabinet have asked me to express to you on their behalf their appreciation both of the spirit in which your proposals were originally put forward and of the patience and care with which you explained them to the Committee. If the Government have not been able to accept your suggestions it is not because they differ from the objects which you have set out but rather because they have felt bound to conclude that these objects would be more rapidly and more completely achieved by the methods which they have themselves adopted.

Mr. Lloyd George proceeded to say that the two most notable features of the Government's statement on his memorandum were, first, the boastful complacency with which they seemed to regard the present economic conditions in the country with their depressed areas, their 2,000,000 unemployed, and their large percentage of the working population who live below the poverty line. Most of their document was taken up not with an examination of his scheme but with a torchlight procession of their own achievements in every sphere of activity. In the second place the Government admitted that if nothing more had been done by them to remedy these conditions it had not been attributable to any lack of available money for any effort that was required. It was remarkable how the old argument hitherto advanced against projects of development—that they might cause financial embarrassment—had been given up.

Employment For All

There could be no graver indictment of the Government's inertia in the face of chronic unemployment than their own words, Mr. Lloyd George continued. They did not say that the country could not afford other plans but that the Government were already doing all that was necessary in a much more effective way. Their document was the most complete essay in self-complacency. The facts of unemployment on a large scale and distress in large areas seemed in no way to disturb this equanimity. He had called attention to four main directions in which employment could be found on a scale which would absorb all who were out of work—(1) the provision of houses to let at an inclusive rent of 10s. a week or under; (2) thorough reconstruction of the road system; (3) reclamation and reconditioning of the land; and (4) the consequent increase in the numbers employed on the land. There were other directions in which further employment could be found.

As to housing and town planning, Mr. Lloyd George said that the Government's criticism of his proposals consisted mainly of a complaint that he had not eulogised to their satisfaction their achievements in this field. His purpose was neither criticism nor eulogy but to point out what still needed doing. The building which had taken place in the last few years had made, as the Government said, "a most substantial contribution to the provision of houses within the means of large classes of wage-earner, especially the 'black-coated' wage-earners" but other large classes had not been provided for. Granted that the bulk of the houses recently built had a rateable value not exceeding £26 a year, this figure corresponded to a rental value of 15s. a week with rates in addition, and did not ensure meeting the objective of a rent of 10s. a week (inclusive of rates), or less, set out as desirable in the Ministry of Health's Circular 1238. A good deal of this building would require a Government subsidy.

If the community took responsiblity for the 2,000,000 houses required in town and country within the next few years, it must require the new dwellings to be built in the right locations, the laying out of residential areas, new transport facilities, and the attraction of industries to sites conventiently placed for the homes of workers.

Mr. Lloyd George repeated that the appropriation of the land values created by these development schemes would provide ample means for financing them. The Road Fund, he also repeated, was quite equal to financing a comprehensive scheme of road reconstruction. In this connexion Mr. Lloyd George said that the Minister of Transport was the only head of a Department concerned with his proposals who was never summoned to be present at the examination of the proposals by the Cabinet Committee.

Agricultural Policy

Concerning agriculture, Mr. Lloyd George said that the Government argued that his proposals would put up the prices of agricultural produce; that they had already succeeded in doing so themselves; and that by their tariff system they had increased home production of manufactured goods at the expense of the foreigner, but that if we attempted by any process to increase the production of food it would be a mistake, for we could not then purchase so much abroad, since our foreign customers would no longer be able to buy from us. Up to 1931, France and Germany were our biggest foreign customers. The Government boasted of the action they took to cripple those valuable markets, but when it came to a question of agricultural products we were told that we must not increase them lest it should hit our customers. In regard to agriculture the Government had adopted the freetrade argument in its most fanatical and distorted form. Like most people gulping a doctrine without understanding it, they misinterpreted it.

Free trade did not mean that if we could produce here goods at an equal price or of better quality than we had been getting from abroad, such production should be discountenanced because it would interfere with our export trade. No real freetrader ever put forward that argument, and no free-trade principle debarred us from trying to improve our own processes and capture our own market. If we had thereby to pay more for food of similar quality grown at home, then he would be against it; but with effective marketing the price could even be reduced.

At present the countries supplying us with kinds of foodstuffs which we might suitably attempt to grow in larger quantities sold to us far more than they bought from us. Some part of the excess of imports from Argentina, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand might represent dividends upon capital lent to them, but it seemed obvious that their purchases from us could be maintained at their present level, even if their sales to us were reduced.

Whether his estimates of possible total increase in production of home-grown foodstuffs were conservative or optimistic was immaterial, because his proposal was confined to such an increase in our production as would provide work in agriculture for 500,000 additional persons. In saying that this would be "an achievement not approached by any country in Europe even under the most intensive policies of agrarian development," the Government overlooked the fact that the scope for such development in this country was also vastly greater than any other country could offer.

In estimating the potential market for home-grown foodstuffs, the possiblity of replacing imported by home-grown products was far from being the most important factor to consider. There was very considerable under-consumption of food among a large section of the population. If the manual and blackcoated unemployed were found regular work, incomes to a total of £250,000,000 a year would replace benefit and assistance payments amounting to £110,000,000 a year and a considerable portion of the additional £140,000,000 would be spent on more and better food. It was childish to suggest that nothing short of an increase in agricultural prices approaching 50 per cent would be required to make it possible for other persons to take up agriculture. Organization of marketing was of the essence of the problem of agriculture.

Proceeding, Mr. Lloyd George said that the Government's criticisms of his plans in many cases took the curious and contradictory form of cavilling in one breath at his proposals, and, in the next asserting that the Government "has recently" undertaken to do something of the same kind, albeit on a minor scale. When the Government concluded by rejecting the plans he had submitted, they did so in large measure because they objected to the scale and degree of the proposed action and not on principle to its nature. They did not propose to acclerate their pace or to adopt any fresh organization which might compel such acceleration.

The Special Areas

That this statement correctly described the attitude of the Government was clear from the evidence of Mr. Malcolm Stewart's first report as Commissioner for the Special Areas. As an argument against his (Mr. Lloyd George's) proposals for public development works the Government asserted that they would not really touch the needs of the special areas.

"Mr. Stewart, on the other hand, openly laments (Mr. Lloyd George said) that the close limitation of his powers prevents him from offering assistance to various public works—including some of those named by me in my proposals, such as the Purfleet tunnel and the Severn bridge—of which he says that it would have been possible to secure a large proportion of the labor and materials from the Special Areas, and carry out works of great national value which would have given employment for several years to substantial numbers of unemployed from the Special Areas.' In face of this statement by their own expert the Governmnt plea that as most of the works might lie outside the Special Areas they would not really touch their needs cannot but appear singularly disingenuous."

Land Reclamation

"Similarly, the Government objects to my proposals for land reclamation on the ground that 'the work could oni yadd to the number of acres under cultivation; it would not increase the profits of agriculture as a whole.' Meanwhile, Mr. Malcolm Stewart is lamenting that, in his efforts to plant people from the Special Areas on the land, he is handicapped by the difficulties and formalities of securing land for the purpose, since it is already in agricultural occupation. To 'add to the number of acres under cultivation' is precisely the remedy he requires for this part of his work on behalf of the Special Areas. He voices a desire to reclaim the Wash, but regrets that the 2½ years of his tenure of office would not see the project to completion, so that he has had to abandon it. Indeed, the burden of Mr. Stewart's complaint is continually that through brevity of office and lack of powers he cannot, and the Government for its part apparently will not, undertake work that ought to be done."

As to the cost of pensions to workers over 60, said Mr. Lloyd George, the figure of £100,000,000 was grotesque. Even if it were accurate it was less than the cost of the dole by £10,000,000 a year, but he had never suggested such a scale. Moreover, he had not suggested that this scheme should be put into immediate operation. He would first of all carry out the various proposals for finding employment, and in his opinion the necessity for granting pensions at the age of 60 would then be obviated. But if new labor-saving appliances economized labor more and more and to such an extent that at the end of a few years there was still a surplus of labor, the country would then have to choose between placing its young people on the dole or its men over 60 on a pension. There could not be any doubt which of the two courses would be preferable.

In reply to questions, Mr. Lloyd George said that he was thrown into a great campaign on his plans and he meant to put them through. He was organizing all over the country and was meeting with a response which was surprising him. When asked if he could give the reason why the Minister of Transport was not brought into the discussions, Mr. Lloyd George said, "All the Ministers opposed to my schemes were brought in."

Soviet Children's Liberty Curbed By New Rulings

Moscow Proclaims Reform Measures To Combat 'Juvenile Hooligans'

Some of the reforms proclaimed at Moscow during the last few months have encroached upon the privileged position hitherto enjoyed—at least in theory—by children in Soviet Russia. The latest of a series of measures to curb the waywardness of young people is the "Reformatory Decree" which was published at the beginning of June and which is to be put into effect in all the territories of Soviet Union. Until the spring of this year no child under the age of 16 years could be lawfully punished in any way.

Children found wandering might only be returned to their parents or placed in a State home for waifs and strays. Instincts of good citizenship were to be fostered in them through their daily intercourse with the Oktyabryata, Pionyery, and Komsomol, the three organizations which serve as models for Soviet youth. The Oktyabryata is composed of some 2,000,000 children between the ages of seven and 11 years; the Pionyery (or "Pioneers") of 6,000,000 between 10 and 16 years; and the Komsomol of 5,000,000 between 14 and 23 years. The next stage of organized progression is into the ranks of the Communist arty, says the Riga E correspondent of the Times, London.

"Juvenile Hooligans!"

The new reformatory system is to embrace the children who have slipped through the net of these organizations and become—according to official Soviet terminology—"juvenile hooligans." How plentiful is the crop of young hooligans may be judged from the preparations prescribed to cope with the evil. According to the latest available official figures there are about 252,900 children in the existing Soviet homes for waifs and strays, which have recently taken in about 45,000 children a year. But great numbers remain on the streets living by their wits and committing crimes ranging from petty theft to burglary and murder.

In February the Soviet Government declared war on "juvenile hooligans" and determined to round up all the youthful criminal elements of Soviet towns and the countryside. The first decree in this connexion, published on March 30, forbade any citizen henceforth to carry or possess a sheath-knife, dagger, or firearm without a special licence, except in places where these weapons were part of the national costume. A week later the Government decreed that all children over 12 years of age should in future be considered as adults in the eyes of the law and be dealt with according to the ordinary criminal code, which had hitherto been applicable only to persons over 16 years old. The June decree is a much longer one, explaining in some detail the new reformatory system and other measures designed to "liquidate" the waif and stray evil.

Two permanent central waif and stray departments have been opened in Moscow, one at the Commissariat of Education and the other under the management of the Narkomvnudel, or Political Police (formerly the O.G.P.U.). There are in the new system five chief types of new homes and reformatories:—

(1) Establishments for collecting and distributing homeless children; (2) "normal" homes for housing and training destitute orphans; (3) homes for children requiring long medical treatment; (4) homes for child invalids; (5) isolated labor colonies managed by Narkomvnudel.

Duties Of Parents

Each of these institutions has its special "labor regime" worked out to suit the age and type of its inmates. The establishments for collecting and distributing homeless children must keep their charges for a time, not exceeding one month, in order to determine the type of home or reformatory to which they are to be allotted. The regime in each establishment must include rewards for good behaviour and punishments—the decree reinstates this word, which had been discarded as "alien to Soviet ideas of justice"—for misdeeds. When the children reach the age of 14 years they are to be sent to special schools, farmed out or apprenticed to factories, State farms, or collective farms, the heads of which are obliged to accept and house them and provide them with labor. The magnitude of the task which this new reform involves may be judged by the fact that already 200 "selected Communists" have been appointed, each to take charge of a home or labor colony as its director; 500 young Communists have been made deputy managers, and 925 other persons have been chosen to act as teachers and instructors in the new establishments.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Executed One

Wenseslao Moguel of Merida, Yucatan, Mexico, was captured by the military forces of the rebel generals Jara and Mucel, on March 18, 1915. At 5 p.m. on the same day, he and other captives were "lined up" against the wall of a church of Halacho in the state of Yucatan, and executed by the regulation firing squad. After the execution, the officer in charge of the firing squad approached the executed men and fired a revolver shot into the temple of each at close range, to make its mark in Moguel, including the "stroke of grace".

The next day Moguel was found unconscious among the dead bodies of his comrades. He was given medical attention and recovered. He is well and alive today, although he will bear to the end, the terrible scars of his "execution".

My cartoon was drawn after original photos of the Fusilado, and the story is certified to by the Municipal President of the city of Merida.

Italy Bars Curb Upon Repudiators

Blocks Extension To All Of Measures Designed To Chasten Germany

Italy blocked a proposal, originally aimed at Germany, for deterrent economic action by League of Nations members against treaty repudiators, on July 29. It was Italy that was host at the tripartite Stresa conference where such measures were first suggested.

The committee at Geneva appointed to draft proposals along this line avoided an admission of failure by providing for a study by experts of just what key products necessary for the manufacture of armaments could be denied to a treaty repudiator without serious economic repercussions. These experts, to be disignated by the Portuguese president of the committee and by the League Secretary General, will report Nov. 30, thus prolonging the l[illegible] main committee, according to the New York Times.

Judicial Study Proposed

The committee also invited member nations to have their national jurists study judicial problems involved. The principal of these is whether the League's unanimity rule requires the assent of a repudiator before action can be taken against her.

The Canadian member of the committee, Dr. Walter Riddell, at today's session proposed that the economic deterrents, originally conceived to apply to the repudiation of the Versailles Treaty by Germany, should apply in all instances of treaty repudiation. Former Minister of Justice Francisci, representing Italy, strenuously objected. He insisted that the measures be restricted to Europe, as envisioned in the original League.

Although there have been many reservations from all sides the principal opposition, aside from Italy's has come from Poland and Hungary. The French, who are pressing the proposal, express satisfaction with the British attitude.

Today's session of the committee, like yesterday's was secret.

Wednesday's meeting of the League Council to discuss the Italo-Ethiopian dispute will be concluded by Saturday night, if Premier Pierre Laval of France has his way. He must be back in Paris on Sunday to issue his next batch of economic decrees. He is undoubtedly planning to make the most of this necessity to rush decisions.

Brief Council Session Seen

Today's developments in the Italo-Ethiopian dispute served generally to strengthen the previous trend limiting the Council session to finding means for continuing arbitration and toward delaying discussion of the basic issues until late in August. Once more the situation seems to depend on Great Britain, but the tendency now is to believe that they will prefer to keep arbitration alive another month to gain time.

One well-informed observer tonight went as far as to say it was already "out of the question" that the Council might enter into any discussion of the real issues between Italy and Ethiopia or take any precautionary measures against war, such as sending neutral observers to the Ethiopian frontiers, as Addis Ababa has requested. He qualified this only by stating that an effort probably would be made to get some written anti-war pledge from Italy.

The arbitration question is deemed important here only from a maneuvering viewpoint. No one seems to believe that an agreement among the arbitrators, even if it favored Italy, would induce Premier Benito Mussolini to withdraw his 200,000 men from Africa. Some reason that, if Mr. Mussolini is going to war in any event, his aggression will appear all the graver after an arbitral award in his favor.

Baldwin Says Recovery In America Slower

security and cheap money to bring about conditions under which we believe ordinary business activities in the country will grow and spread so long as those conditions last."

Mr. Baldwin frankly admitted that depressed industrial regions in North England still are in a bad way, with unemployment in some district running as high as 50 per cent. He explained that one of the methods adopted for solving a regional problem was the transfer of workers. He expressed the hope that many of them would find jobs because of Air Force expansion work and the London transport scheme. He regretted the fact that new industries being established near London had not seen fit to locate in the depressed North.

Lawyer Sentenced In Kidnapper Case

Denver Man Who Defended Abductors Gets 10 Years

Ben B. Laska, a Denver lawyer who defended kindnappers, received ten years in Oklahoma City on July 29 for conspiracy in the $200,000 abduction of Charles F. Urschel, oil operator.

He denied reports that he said he had heard that he might try suicide to avoid prison, according to the New York Times.

"I know people are saying I may 'blow my top," he said. Then he demanded:

"But you never heard of a Jew killing himself, did you?"

Laska, whose conviction was hailed by the government as a victory in the drive against lawyers who defend kidnappers, protested tearfully. An appeal was filed immediately.

"Ten years," he cried. "They gave me ten years for taking a fee to defend a man; they stood me up just like I was a common criminal, instead of an attorney who has practiced his profession twenty-seven years.

"It's awful, terrible, to treat an innocent man like that."

Laska was the twentieth person to be sentenced by Federal Judge Edgar S. Vaught for various roles in the machine-gun abduction of the Oklahoma City oil man on July 22, 1933. Mr. Urchel was returned unharmed. Most of the ransom was recovered.

The conviction of Laska was based on testimony by Edward Feldman and his mother, Clara Feldman, that the attorney accepted from them $10,000 in "hot ransom cash" to defend Albert Bates, convicted kidnapper, later directing disposal of the remainder of Bates's $75,000 share of the ransom.

Feldman and his mother received suspended five-year sentences for their confessed part in the conspiracy.

Protesting his innocence, Laska stood up before Judge Vaughn, after motion for a new trial had been overruled.

With arms outspread, he raised a tear-streaked face.

"Judge, all I can say is, be reasonable," he pleaded. "And innocent man is going to be sentenced."

"It is not pleasant for me to sentence an attorney," said Judge Vaught. "On the other hand, an offense has been committed. Someone must pay to it."

After pronouncing sentence, the judge approved a $10,000 appeal bond.

Planets More Bulky Than Jupiter Held Improbable

The sizes of stars and planets are not accidents. Considering the subject in The Scientific American, Dr. Henry Norris Russell of Princeton decides that "a star of a given kind of matter and a given mass, after it has lost all the energy which it can possibly radiate into space and has settled down into the degenerate condition, must have a perfectly definite size and an equally definite internal constitution.* * *. The larger the mass the smaller will it be when it has shrunk to the limit."

A star composed of carbon, oxygen and heavier elements and with a mass a quarter that of the sun would end with a diameter about twice that of the earth. If the mass were half that of the sun, the final body would be half again as big as the earth,, and if it were 1.43 times as big or more, there would be no limit to contraction. From this it may be deduced that planets very much bulkier than Jupiter (diameter, 87,000 miles) are impossible.

Wandering Island

The Haut Lake near, Marksuhl in Thuringia, Germany, covers an area of about 5 acres, and is 22 feet deep. Its greatest natural curiosity is a floating island which is 78 feet long and 26 feet wide. The island is covered with verdure and trees and consists largely of a foundation of peat moss.

Seeds More Valuable Than Gold

Double petunia seeds are wholesaled to the trade at $4000 per pound or $250 per ounce. They are then sold to the consumer in packets of 600 seeds each at the price of $2 per packet. There are 200,000 seeds to an ounce. At this price they cost the consumer about $10,656 per pound—which is about 24 times as valuable as fine gold.

Bolivia To Supply Jobs For Warriors

Ex-Soldier Indians To Be Given Work On Farms

Peculiarities of Bolivia's distribution of labor may save that country from the worst of the unemployment troubles in a land to which an army returns from war.

Thanks to her large Indian population, Bolivia's army in the Chaco drew proportionately few men from the urban ranks of trade and industry, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The old modes of living await the soldiers returning to the farm. Bolivians who hope to avoid the backwash of unemployment which followed the World War in the United States and other countries believe their country can absorb the returning Indians without serious difficulty.

The problem may be more difficult for the minority of soldiers from the educated classes.

Their absences were met chiefly in three ways: By carrying on business shorthanded; by employment of women, although this was done only to a small extent; by hiring immigrants from Chile and Peru.

The first two solutions are expected to prove relatively easy of adjustment. Observers here believe the few Bolivian working women are not likely to hold on to new-found jobs with the same tenacity that their European and North American sisters displayed.

The replacing of Chileans and Peruvians may prove more difficult Under the Buenos Aires peace protocol, Bolivian and Paraguay have ninety days to effect demobilization of their armies from the date when the international military commission in the Chaco certifies to the positions of the armies.

Washout

Once a year the newsboys of a certain district of London are taken for an outing up the Thames by a gentleman of the neighborhood, where they can bathe to their heart's content.

As one little boy was getting into the water a friend observed: "I say, Bill, ain't you dirty!"

"Yes," replied Bill. "I missed the train last year." — Vancouver Province.

"To what do you attribute your remarkable health?"

"Well," replied the very old gentleman, "I reckon I got a good start on most people by bein' born before germs was discovered, thereby havin' less to worry about."—Washington Evening Star.

Although the artist has an exceedlingly powerful voice, his pianissimo is of an unusual softness and delicacy, proving him to have mastered the greatest difficulties existing for the voice.

The audience appreciated especially the operatic airs such as Wagner's "Walkure" and "Lohengrin" as well as "Le pecheur de perles" by Bizet and airs from Puccini's "Tosca" and "Turandot" and he had to sing many numbers not on the program.

House Of Lords Alters India Bill

India Office Issues Memo Explaining Purpose Of Changes

The India Office July 25 issued a long memorandum in explanation of the amendments made in the House of Lords to the Government of India Bill.

A very large number of the amendments were drafting amendments, and many others were consequential according to The Times, London. The memorandum describes the purpose and effect of those of a more substantial nature.

On Clause 2 an amendment was made to enable the Secretary of State to exercise outside India on behalf of his Majesty the powers in relation to the States which are to be exercisable in India only by, or by persons acting under the authority of, his Majesty's representative for the exercise of the functions of the Crown in its relations with Indian States.

The purpose of amendments to Clauses 21 and 64 is to enable the Advocate-General of the Federation and the Provinces to speak in either Chamber of the Legislature, and thus to make available to the Governor-General and Governors this official as the means of explaining their point of view to the Legislature.

Of the amendments to Clauses 45 and 93, the memorandum says that the first is intended to meet a point raised in the House of Commons that Parliament, once having given approval to the extension of a Proclamation under this clause beyond the first six months, should not be required to give approval to its further continuance (in the event of continuance being necessary for a considerable period) at such frequent intervals as six months. The amendment makes such approval necessary at intervals of 12 months. The second amendment is intended to make it clear that the period of three years in all for which a Proclamation under this clause can remain in force is a continuous period—i.e., that the three years would not be exhausted by two separate periods, perhaps with many years' interval between them, of 18 months. The effect of subclause (5) is to make it clear that any laws passed by the Governor-General or the Governor, as the case may be, in exercise of legislative powers assumed by him under this clause are not automatically to expire on the expiry of the Proclamation, but continue in force for a period of two years thereafter unless sooner repealed or re-enacted by the Legislature concerned.

The effect of amendments to Clauses 110 and 208 is to make plainer the intention of the Bill that the Indian Legislature will have no power to affect the right of the King in Council to grant special leave to appeal against the decision of Courts in India in any matter, and not only, as the Bill provides in clause 208, in respect of criminal cases.

The purpose of a new clause to follow Clause 224 is to require a High Court, it moved so to do by the Federal or a Provincial Government, to transfer to its own file and decide any case in which the validity of a Federal or Provincial Act is a material issue. The object in view is to afford means of securing an early and authoritative decision on this issue which may well be of public importance.

Amendments to Clause 303 have the effect of giving to every Governor-General, Governor, or Secretary of State, and to his Majesty's representative for the exericise of the functions of the Crown in its relations with Indian States, complete immunity during his term of office from any suit or prosecution from any Court in India and from any process, e.g., subpoena as a witness issuing from any Court in India. After these officials have ceased to hold office, the amendments provide that they shall normally have immunity from suits and prosecutions in respect of their official acts and omissions in all Courts in India. But for obvious reasons a power is retained to his Majesty in Council to sanction proceedings in India in extreme cases. The clause does not, of course, bar suits or prosecutions in the United Kingdom.

The main amendment to the Schedule substitutes direct election by voters in territorial communal constituencies for the General, Mohamedan, and Sikh seats, in place of indirect election by the Provincial Upper Houses (or Electoral Colleges in the unicameral Provinces). The arrangements for electing Anglo-Indian, Indian Christian, and European members of the Council of State are left unchanged. Six seats for women are provided as before, and under the amendment six seats are allotted for the Scheduled Castes.

threat of tuberculosis and other illnesses, will not be known until later.

Manhattan, where many thousands of youngsters are jammed into congested, poverty-stricken areas on the East and West Sides and in Harlem, shows the highest ratio of malnutrition—23.8 per cent— and the Bronx follows with 20.8 per cent. In 1929 the city-wide average was 13.4 per cent, one-fourth less than the present total.

Emergency Program Urged

To meet the challenge of near-starvation and illness, the report recommends a broad emergency program for rehabilitation of handicapped pupils. Leading the program is the suggestion that at least one open-air class be established in every school. In congested districts two open-air classes for each school are asked.

The report was submitted by Dr. Adela J. Smith, assistant director of health education in charge of the division. She points out that the 11,829 physically handicapped pupils who receive training in schools and the 891 others who are taught at home by visiting teachers make the division the largest of its kind in the nation. She adds that its administrative overhead is the lowest.

Dr. Smith surveys the entire field of school service to cardiopathic, crippled and tuberculous boys and girls and to those confined to homes and hospitals.

Hundreds of children, the report says, were found "in dire want for suitable clothes, food, warmth and special appliances, orthopedic shoes and glasses."

Emergency relief was obtained for them. Free medical and surgical care and nurse service were arranged for indigent families. Milk was provided for all seriously undernourished homebound youngsters. Dispossess notices were stayed for fifteen families in which there were crippled children. Summer vacations were arranged for hundreds of the handicapped.

"In practically every family, home and school, relief work had to be accomplished before each physically handicapped child could be suitably and comfortably adjusted for his special education," the report says.

Epileptics Special Problem

It calls special attention to the plight of epileptics, barred from schooling by inadequate facilities. It warns that many children in this class are becoming "psychopathic cases due to their suspension from school, worry over the loss of educational facilities and lack of interesting occupation while their playmates brothers and sisters are at school."

As an indication of the "dividends" which the division's work brings, Dr. Smith includes in her report a bundle of letters from children, parents and friends—pathetic little tokens telling of the blessings that have resulted from the special training provided for all types of handicapped boys and girls.

Among the recommendations in the report are the following:

Day camps for tuberculous children in Brooklyn and Queens and additional day camps in Manhattan.

At least two cardiopathic classes in every school district.

Enough home teachers to extend educational privileges to all homebound physically handicapped children who would profit thereby, including chronic medical cases.

Sufficient increase in the personnel of the division, including more assistants for field work, two visiting teachers and one psychologist.

Mrs. Hanau, Noted French Swindler Takes Life In Cell

An overdose of narcotics, taken in her jail cell, ended on July 19 the spectacular financial career of Mrs. Marthe Hanau, "financial wizard" of Paris.

The police immediately opened an investigation to determine how the narcotics reached the cell in which she had spent six months of the three-year sentence imposed upon her at her last trial for swindling, says the New York Times.

A report from the Fresnes prison said Mrs. Hanau, whose get-rich-quick schemes drew francs from the hiding places of thousands of small savers throughout France, had been unconscious since she took the narcotics on Monday.

Mrs. Hanau associated with government leaders, financiers and other notables at the height of her career. At one time she operated a bank with 400 branches in France. She published two journals to advance her ideas. One which she continued to direct from prison, gave financial tips and often exposed scandals before they reached the ears of the authorities.

Her publication brought her back into cantact with the law after her conviction with her ex-husband, Lazare Bloch, in March, 1931, on charges of swindling. At that time she was sentenced to two years in prison but was released because she had been held since 1928 awaiting trial.

A secret report of the Prefect of Police concerning Mrs. Hanau's activities appeared in the newspaper and Pierre-Etienne Flandin, then Minister of Finance, charged it had been stolen.

Back in the hands of the police, she started a hunger strike that lasted thirteen days, focussed the attention of all France upon her and finally forced the police to take her to a hospital. She escaped, however, but was returned to the prison. There she renewed the hunger strike.

Mrs. Marthe Hanau and her business partner, Lazare Bloch, who was her divorced husband, had been trying all their lives to make a fortune. First, she peddled linen in Montmartre, then she had a perfume shop which failed. With the advent of the war she sold a tubed "soldiers' comforter," but it go her into trouble when the authorities discovered it was made of rum and coffee.

She opened a soap shop, made the acquaintance of a mysterious "Mrs. Joseph" who staked her to a small capital in 1926 and she conceived the idea of starting a financial newspaper, the Gazette of France, which had a great success as an independent journal of information for investors.

Several subsidiaries for placing and investing funds were organized and agents started working in all parts of France. The concern eventually controlled five big offices in Paris and 400 branches. Investments were kept secret, complainants were bought off, and unprotesting victims paid the costs.

Agents of the couple tempted small investors with offers of huge profits. Prominent names were listed as contributors to the Gazette; some were faked, others obtained at high prices. An account was established at the Bank of France and inquirers were told to address the Gazette in care of the Bank.

Investigators found her books hid a bankruptcy that had assets of 11,000,000 francs and liabilities of 110,000,000. Mrs. Hanau and her former husband were arrested in December, 1928. High personages were implicated and a political crisis was threatened.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Eternal Fire

Situated exactly on the edge of the active volcano, Kilauea, on the island of Hawaii, is the Volcano House, from the front veranda of which, one can gaze down on Haleamaumau, the huge firepit of Pele, the Goddess of Fire. Kilauea has been active an average of once a year for the past 35 years, and in the great fire pit the lava has been burning and boiling continuously since time immemorial. Almost as constant, however, is the fire in the delightful hearth of the Volcano House, which has been burning continuously for 61 years. The fire, lighted there in 1874, has never been allowed to go out.

The Witching Squad

During the World War both the Austrian and German Army High Commands drafted the International Society of Diving Rod Men into service for the purpose of locating hidden springs of water in the arid regions of Eastern and Southern Europe. These military commands speak highly of the success of the diving rod.

When Turkey entered the war on the side of the Central Powers, she organized a regular company of "Divining Rod" men. They were equipped with a rod made of iron as thick as a finger, and bore on the dollar of their uniform the emblem of their vocation. Their commander was Major Graeve, a famous German "Douser". In three desert campaigns, the company is said to have rendered signal service, by locating numerous hidden springs in the waterless deserts of Sinai, Palestine and Suez.

The "rod" is said to have a negative and a positive pole. Only the right hand reacts to the presence of water through mysterious emanations from the soil. A "douser's" record in the Turkish army was excellent if his divining was 70 per cent correct.

Bathing Suit Shocks California Lifeguard

Rengo

LOS ANGELES,—Miss Ann Christie, who is a movie actress, appeared at the Hermosa Beach police police station to ask if a fish-net bathing suit she was wearing really was objectionable.

She introduced herself to Mr. Eddie Messenger, the Chief of Police, and deposed as follows:

"Chief, a nasty old lifeguard chased me off the beach because he thought this fish-net bathing suit was too revealing. So I wore it down here to show you. What do you think?"

Mr. Messenger wrinkled his brow and squinted at the delightful Miss Christie.

"What's beneath the net?" he asked. "Is that er—you, or what is it?"

"Why, that's flesh-colored jersey," said Miss Christie.

"Well, in that case, I think the suit is all right." The Chief of Police replied. 'Til try to get the City Council to overrule the lifeguard."

Hermosa Beach is known for being pretty strict about its bathing apparel.

Red Penetration Into US Revealed

Great Credit Claimed In Moscow Report For Activity In American Strikes

MOSCOW, July 28.—Orders from the Comintern (Communist International) to Communist parties in capitalist countries, including the United States, were made public at Moscow on July 28, according to the Moscow correspondent of the New York Times.

They specifically direct the American Communist party to extend its influence in the regular labor unions by boring from within and to take advantage of the discontent of both industrial workers and farmers in order to create a united proletarian front.

The orders were included in the report of the executive committee of the Comintern delivered by William Pieck, German delegate, to the Seventh Congress, now convening here. The report also contained a suggestion that American church property be confiscated to aid the unemployed.

"In the Soviet Union," is reads, "in the famine of 1921, for example, the people forced the clergy of the reactionary Christian church to turn over to the masses their gold and silver in order to succor the hungry. The people in Germany, the United States, Austria and other countries should force the wealthy, the church and the State to open their treasuries for those who are hungry."

Mr. Pieck, in analyzing the position of the Communist party in the United States, said it had grown numerically and in influence among wide masses of workers, farmers and intelligentsia.

"But in order further to widen its influence among the workers, the masses of the party must grow and strengthen its position in a number of trade union movements," the report continued, "and must more energetically than before carry on the struggle for the creation of a wide party movement among workers and farmers so as to form a coalition of all worker organizations against the bourgeoisie." In recent Communist activities in the United States, Mr. Pieck said, revolutionary workers have succeeded in extending their influence in many organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and have had a decisive hand in the most important strikes of 1934, including the seamen's strike on the Pacific Coast and the San Francisco general strike.

Mr. Pieck also said that American Communists had drafted an unemployment insurance law that had won support from trade unions and the advanced intelligentsia.

Referring to the weaknesses in the work of Communists in the United States, however, he said they had succeeded in interesting only 10 to 20 per cent of the unemployed and had made no effective use of hunger marches. He also criticized the Communists for not attempting to win support from farmers, who were discontented by low prices, until the farmers' movement was waning.

Revolution Not Ripe

Mr. Pieck admitted that revolutionary developments in capitalist countries were not yet ripe, but confirmed the fact that the new and more moderate course of the Communist party was by no means an abandonment of the world revolutionary purpose.

"The victory of socialism on a world scale in a brief historic period is assured if peace is maintained, thus making possible new victories of socialism in U. S. S. R.," he said. "The capitalist system will not leave the stage without a struggle. Certain capitalist countries may overcome unfavorable conditions temporarily, thus easing the position of bourgeoisie, but this cannot lead to stabilization and to recession of the revolutionary wave.

"No matter what direction the development takes, the world is headed for revolution."

Earl Browder, general secretary of the American Communist party, spoke at last night's session, saying the party had penetrated all strata of American workers after purging the ranks of Trotskyists and deviationists. He asserted that the Negro membership had grown considerably.

100 Soldiers Bar Matamoros Coup

Take Control Of Mexican City And Prevent Ousting Of Local Regime By Agrarians

While agents of President Lazaro Cardenas of Mexico conferred late on July 24 with Governor Rafael Villareal of the State of Tamaulipas in an effort to work out the present political revolution in that State, the old city of Matamoros, just across the Rio Grande River from Brownsville, Texas, was under martial law, with General Gazriel Cervera in charge.

General Cervera stepped into Matamoros that afternoon just before 4 p.m., the deadline that had been set by the 2,500 armed peasants for a march on the City Hall, forcibly to oust the city administration, according to the New York Times.

Mayor Rafael Mounguia and his staff, including city policemen, had held the city hall, declaring they would rather die fighting than turn it over the Agrarians. It appeared for a time that there would be a bloody encounter, and citizens living near the main plaza were warned to leave their homes by former Mayor Roberto Garcia, who himself had been ousted from office in 1932. He has been picked as representative of the Agrarians.

Meanwhile, it appeared certain that the Federal Government of Mexico would take a strong hand in affairs of the entire State government, as the Mexican Minister of the Interior Silvano Barba Gonzales, went to Tampico late today for a conference with Governor Villareal.

At sundown today, the peasants who have for two days besieged Matamoros started disbanding, confident that their interests would be taken care of. It was freely predicted that Mayor Munguia and his administration would not go back into office, although definite action was being held up pending the outcome of the conference at Tampico between Governor Villareal and the Minister of the Interior.

At the border city of Reynosa, the present government remained in power, the threatened peasant invasion failing to materialize. Nuevo Laredo was in the hands of the military forces.

Poles Threaten To Coerce Danzig

Press Is Irate Over Disregard By Nazi Of Restrictions On Customs Collections

The Warsaw press on July 24 appealed to the government to use all its authority to break Danzig's resistance against the Finance Minister's order forbidding Danzig customs officials to handle goods imported into Poland proper.

Arthur Greiser's announcement that he had ordered customs officers to disregard the new Polish regulations was considered there as "action in direct violation of Poland's treaty rights," according to the New York Times.

Hitherto, in Polish comment on the Danzig situation, Germany has seldom been mentioned. Now, however, in reply, the Berlin press, which is reported here generally to take the Danzig viewpoint, Germans are warned that their support of the Danzig Senate may affect adversely Polish-German relations.

The government organ Kuryer Poranny expressed regret that the German press, failing to understand the recent Polish decision, presented it to the public as an attack against Danzig.

"Berlin should understand," this newspaper says, "that Poland, fully recognizing Danzig's right to national independence, cannot tolerate violation of her vital economic interest.

"The German people do not know, perhaps, that, after withdrawal of the Reich subsidies, Danzig could not afford to finance the huge National Socialist party machinery. The Polish Government is always ready to aid Danzig, but only if it is able to control the credit policy of the Bank of Danzig.

The newspaper voices the opinion of Warsaw governmental circles that Danzig's financial difficulties are mainly caused by extravagant spending by the government and a dangerous credit policy by the Bank of Danzig, which, under government pressure, lent large sums to various Nazi organizations.

"The tariff dispute with Danzig," says the nationalist Wieczor Warszawski, came at a time of important changes in the Baltic, where the balance of power is being upset by the Anglo-German naval agreement. All the Baltic countries, including Poland, now seem to be menaced by the growing German navy. Danzig events are being watched here with more than usual interest."

Composer Marks 'Hot Time' Jubilee

T. A. Metz, 88, Tells How Song That Started Ragtime Vogue Was Written 50 Years Ago

Fifty years after writing the music of "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," Theodore A Metz, the composer, who is 88 years old, has written a new song, "There's a Secret in My Heart."

In July 24 the song was sung for the first time in public by Dale Wimbrow over radio station WJZ, New York City, and Mr. Metz was a guest of honor at the broadcast and introduced on the air in a coast-to-coast hook-up.

As part of the golden jubilee celebration of the writing of the song which became the favorite air of the soldiers in the Spanish-American War and marked the beginning of jazz, then called ragtime, Mr. Metz, at his desk in the office of the Edward B. Marks Music Publishing Company, in the RCA Building, told of the birth of the song, says the New York Times.

"I hope my new song will achieve at least something of the popularity that greeted my composition of half a century ago," he said. "It is a waltz song, and teachers of ballroom dancing tell me that the waltz is coming into its own. In its production I have collaborated with a lyric writer sixty years younger than myself, Stanley Adams.

"Fifty years ago I was the leader of the band of McIntyre and Heath's Ministrels. One day while on tour we passed through a small place in Mississippi called Old Town. A building was on fire. McIntyre remarked, "There'll be a hot time in the old town tonight." The idea of the air flashed into my mind, and I soon completed it. The words were supplied by members of the troupe.

"'Hot Time' gave the first idea of jazz, and it is still being played, being one of the most popular airs for parades and other celebrations in the movies. While we sang the song with the minstrels, it did not attain real popularity until the Spanish-American War.

"Theodore Roosevelt, the late President, greeted me in Chicago by saying: 'I'm proud to shake the hand of the man who wrote the song that stirred the nation.'"

Two years ago Mr. Metz composed the "President Roosevelt March" in honor of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Former popular hits of the Nineties which he wrote and for which he received no compensation, he says, were "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ah" and "Sweet Marie."

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

A Horse Waiting For 863 Years

Mohammed Ibn Daud (1029-1072) Sultan of Persia and of the vast part of the world lying between the Tigris and the Oxus, was called Adhaddedin (Protector of the Faith). Through great conquests, he extended the frontiers of his realm, and accumulated great treasures. There were 1200 sovereigns and princes among his subjects. He died in 1072, and was buried in Meru, Khorassan. His rule coincided with one of the Golden Ages of Persia.

After his death, folklore and legend attached themselves to his memory. It was predicted that he would rise from his tomb, mount his horse and lead his subjects to new conquests and greatness. So strong was this faith, that in all the intervening 872 years since his death, the mosque has held a saddled horse in readiness, against the time when the Sultan will emerge from his tomb, to resume the reins of mount and government. It is the strangest manifestation of faith and attachment I have ever encountered among the strange peoples of the Orient.

Movie Actress Gets Decree As Cabot Fails To Contest

LOS ANGELES, July 24.—Adrienne Ames, motion-picture actress, received an interlocutory decree of divorce today from her third husband, Bruce Cabot, film actor. She testified Cabot did not love her and "was not cut out for marriage."

Jacques Etienne de Bujac was the name on the interlocutory decree, that being Cabot's legal name. Cabot did not contest the case.

Custody of the actress's 12-year-old daughter was awarded to her. It was her child by her first marriage to Derward Truax, a Texas oil man. The girl had been legally adopted by Stephen Ames, her second husband, and late by Cabot.

The actress and Cabot were married at Carlisbad, N. M., Oct. 31, 1933, and separated twelve days ago. Property settlement was made out of court.

British Set Up Steering-Gear Investigation

attention here owing to statements of an analogous kind made by no less an authority than Lord Runciman, veteran shipowner and father of Mr. Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Trade in the now existing British Government. Addressing the North of England Shipping Association at Blyth on June 13, Lord Runciman said: "Fully two thirds of the founderings that happen in the Atlantic—I am talking to you now as an old sailor who has been through storms both in sail and steam—are through overloading. There is a very narrow margin between safety and unsafety, and only those who have encountered Atlantic storms can realize it. . . . The sooner we cause the president of the Board of Trade, a member of my own family, to tackle this matter, and get an international agreement that the freeboard should be altered and vessels not to be overloaded as they are at present, the better."

The question has been taken up strongly alike in the London press and in British shipping circles generally. The only question now is, not whether action should be taken, but now to choose a method of procedure most likely to prove effective for reform.

Roosevelt's Foes In Party Band As Coalition Dies

Ritchie a Potential Challenge

While normally a Ritchie delegation from Maryland would seem perfectly proper, a Ritchie delegation in a convention slated to renominate President Roosevelt and indorse the New Deal would be a challenge. Whether the Maryland Democracy is prepared to go so far, it seems to be a bit early to say. Certainly the spirit is willing. The former Governor, when presented for a recent speech in which he assailed the New Deal, was introduced as one likely to be introduced before long as "the President." His long-standing championship of states' rights, it is explained, makes him a logical opponent of the New Deal thesis for centralizing power in Washington.

Georgia, under the political control of Governor Eugene Talmadge, will send no Roosevelt delegation to the convention. Nor will Louisiana, or any of the other states (estimated at six) in which the Huey Long philosophy is strong. The two Massachusetts Democratic factions which split over Mr. Roosevelt in 1932, are now both bitter against him and the New Deal. It is hard to see how a Roosevelt delegation can come from there.

In Virginia there is sentiment for pledging the delegation to Senator Carter Glass, if for no other reason than to indorse his fight, step by step, against the New Deal. Senator Glass, after a lifetime of adherence to the Democratic party, stimulated by personal memories of Reconstruction Days, cannot possibly support President Roosevelt for re-election. The only way he can consistently vote Democratic for President next time is to have another Democratic nominee. His devoted junior colleague, Senator Harry F. Byrd, is in a like dilemma, and, in some respects, an even worse one. With Senator Glass coming up for re-election to the Senate, Senator Byrd could hardly support both him and the President, and especially in view of his own bitter fight on the New Deal.

In California, Upton Sinclair, who captured the Democratic gubernatorial nomination last year on his "Epic" platform, has turned against both the President and James A. Farley, his Postmaster General. If it is in his power again to dominate the Democratic party of that state, it will send no Roosevelt-instructed delegation.

These situations are matters of some concern to the Democratic high command, because of their potentialities for spreading. Mr. Farley has had scouts of his own out in the field and is following up their surveys by personal investigation. While it still seems a far cry to the prevention of President Roosevelt's renomination, a sizable defection in his own national convention would be morally dangerous, especially if accompanied by these other independent Democratic movements. It would be one thing for President Roosevelt to face his adversaries Democratic and Republican, with the united backing of the Democratic National Convention, and quite another to go into the campaign with disunion even in his own ranks. It may force the President to make a fight in some of the state Presidential primaries next year.

On the Republican side, Senator William E. Borah, of Idaho, and Senator Hiram W. Johnson, of California, are believed to be preparing to work a squeeze play to render former President Hoover ineffective. While Senator Johnson is probably Mr. Hoover's hitterest political foe, in any party, Senator Borah, although Mr. Hoover's star campaigner of 1928, is no less determined to block him out of public life entirely. In fact, most of the talk of "smoking Hoover out" originates privately with Senator Borah and former Vice-President Charles Curtis, the latter of whom has never forgiven the Hoover forces for hesitating to declare unequivocally for his renomination in 1932. Senator Charles L. McNary, of Oregon, Republican leader of the Senate, is, in a sense, a party to the agitation.

With Mr. Hoover undoubtedly determined not to be pushed out of the picture, especially by his sworn political enemies in his own party, the effect of this "smoking out" process to date has seemingly been to stiffen his resistance and make all the more remote the possibility of his issuing a statement renouncing all thought of a renomination for the Presidency. Otherwise, it is said, Mr. Hoover himself does not know yet whether he will or will not be in the running next year, and prefers to await developments.

In the eyes of his enemies, however, he is drifting into a position where, rising from his defeat of 1932, he may feel the sting of the enmity of Senators Borah and Johnson.

On the theory that Mr. Hoover will want a voice, if not the nomination, in the Republican National Convention, he has three strings to his bow. First, it would be important for him to have the control of the delegation from his home state, California. Senator Johnson will make it his business to prevent that, if possible. Despite his open bolt from Mr. Hoover in 1932, he carried the Republican Senatorial primary last year.

If Mr. Hoover could not be in a position to speak for the state of his residence, it is pointed out, it would be an advantage for him to have the loyal backing of Iowa, his birthplace, as he had it in 1928 and 1932. Next year, however, Iowa is likely to have a candidate of its own. Its Senator, Lester J. Dickenson, Mr. Hoover's keynoter in 1932, is all but an avowed candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination. Mr. Hoover, it is felt, would not feel like asking Senator Dickenson to step aside.

The third string to Mr. Hoover's bow could be Ohio. It is the one state in the Union which requires a candidate to put his brand on persons who seek to go to the national convention in his name. The primary comes next spring. Walter F. Brown, Postmaster General under Mr. Hoover, is the Republican National Committeeman for Ohio. He would go down the line for Mr. Hoover if he thought Mr. Hoover desired it. Whether or no Mr. Hoover does desire it will have to be shown by the time the primary comes around.

Should Mr. Hoover declare himself a candidate, Senator Borah without a doubt would jump into the fight against him. The Idahoan might even permit his name to be entered in the primary as a candidate against Mr. Hoover. Many think that, however he might run elsewhere, Mr. Borah would run well in Ohio. It is recalled that he is extremely close to the La Follettes and that even President Coolidge, after his nomination in Cleveland, lost that city to the late Senator Robert M. La Follette in 1924.

The recent agitation for the nomination of Senator Borah by the Republicans is rooted partly in Ohio. In view of his consistent reputation as a constitutionalist, and his early challenge to the New Deal on constitutional grounds, it is urged that Senator Borah is the "logical" candidate for the Republicans to run against Roosevelt. Some say that if it were not for his age (he just turned seventy) and his own reported disinclination, nothing could stop his nomination next year.

Students of his career doubt he could be persuaded to run, save perhaps in spots to help lock Mr. Hoover and help "purge" the Republican party of what he considers its "reactionary leadership." They point to the fact that whenever it has come right down to a decision, he has never cared to run for President. In 1924, he turned down the Vice-Presidency. Mr. Coolidge personally offered him a place as his running mate after Will H. Hays and the late George Harvey had carried word to William M. Butler, Mr. Collidge's campaign manager, at Cleveland, that the Senator would take second place on the ticket.

It was felt that if Senator Borah would not run now, and moreover, that he has never sought executive responsibility. Even some of the Republican leaders he would oust concede the good faith of his championship of the constitution. Mr. Coolidge is reported to have observed on one occasion that however much Senator Borah may have opposed his policies in Congress, he never voted to override his veto. Mr. Coolidge, basing most of his vetoes on constitutional grounds, associated Senator Borah's reluctance to override with his devotion to the constitution.

At the moment, with most of the insurgent Republicans of yesterday washing their hands of Republican party reorganization, Senators Borah and Johnson appear to be most likely to challenge, from that source, any move to bring Mr. Hoover back to the party helm. Mr. Hoover, if he should decide not to seek the nomination, would still want vindication in the form of a conservative Republican ticket and candidate. Senator Borah is prepared to oppose him on that and Senator Johnson to oppose giving him a hand in the California delegation.

In the Republican high command, meanwhile, all calculations on 1936 take into account to possibility of a divided Democratic party.

Congress Faces Greatest Woes In Next Session

Unfinished Business And New Measures To 'Jam The Works' On Campaign Eve

A demand of Senator William E. Borah, insurgent Republican, of Idaho, that Congress remain in Washington until November 1, if need be, to finish clearly the difficulties ahead of the next session of Congress.

Just at a time when there was some talk in Administration quarters of making next winter's session brief and quiet to avoid adding to the troubles of the 1936 Presidential campaign, Senator Borah's demand, with other recent developments has made it plain that the next session will be charged with all manner of political dynamite.

Moreover, it may prove to be a long session, according to John Snure in the New York Herald Tribune. It is sure to reek with partisan discussion, and there are growing indications that a series of measures will be forced to the front which will be embarrassing for the Administration with a Presidential campaign just ahead, and embarrassing for members of Congress who seek reelection, especially Democratic members.

Berate Proposal

Senate and House Democratic leaders and Administration aids at the Capitol hastened to berate the proposal of Senator Borah that Congress remain in Washington this fall and dispose of the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage refinancing bill and the bonus bill.

Of course, the Borah plan will not be followed. Senator Borah, however, emphasizes what is undoubtedly true—that these two issues must be met by Congress. They will be forced to a vote next session if not now. Hence, he maintains, they might better be dealt with now than shunted over to the campaign period.

Advocates of the Frazier-Lemke bill, involving inflation, or at least reflation, and the bonus bill, also involving inflation, have not the slightest intention of curbing their activities. They plan to make intensive drives next session if they are balked this session.

But other matters on the horizon appear even more troublesome and worrisome to the Democratic leaders and the rank and file in the two houses. Most serious are the swelling expenditure of the government and the rapidly expanding public debt.

More Relief Funds Wanted

It is now clear that the coming session will be called on by the Administration for a large additional appropriation to keep the expanded machinery of government going and further meet the costs of works and relief. That appropriation, according to preliminary figures under consideration by officials, is likely to be $3,000,000,000 or more.

When Congress virtually was forced to pass the $4,880,000,000 works and relief bill, amid much protest led by conservative Democratic Senators, it was more or less implied that this would be the end of such huge spending.

Many members brought themselves to vote for this great blanket appropriation and turn it over to the President by accepting the argument that the expenditure of this unprecedented sum for works and relief would definitely turn the tide of things in this country, and end the depression and restore several millions of men to the ranks of the employed.

One may be sure that a call on Congress for another large appropriation will encounter a great protest, almost a revolt.

Projected over to the next session will be important bills, in addition to the bonus and Frazier-Lemke measures, which will give difficulty. Whether the Guffey coal bill will be passed this session is not yet entirely settled. The thirty-hour work week bill will be up again. The ship subsidy question will be up for another controversy next January. The control of munitions and the proposed neutrality legislation are subjects with which the next session apparently will have to wrestle. The Administration transportation program will be but partly disposed of this session. Other bills will remain, also.

1,537 Arrested In Paris During Workers' Riot

1,067 Of Number Employees Of State; All But 24 Are Liberated

One thousand five hundred and thirty seven persons, including 1,067 employees of the State, were arrested during the demonstrations round the Opera on the evening of July 19 were and detained all night in police stations. It was decided that all except 18 foreigners and six Frenchmen, who had been charged with violent behavior, should be released at once, and this was done.

The police reported to the Government that there were 449 unemployed workmen among the prisoners—a fact which goes far to explain the markedly Communistic nature of the demonstration in the Boulevard Haussmann, according to The Times, London.

The article by the journal's Paris correspondent dated July 21 continues:

These men marched in an organized procession across the Boulevard des Italiens. There were also the 18 foreigners mentioned above. Of the State employees who were arrested, over one-third were railway men, about one-fifth were municipal workers, one-ninth were postal or telegraph workers, and only 39, or less than 4 per cent., were Civil servants from Government offices. The element of manual labor among the functionnaires would perhaps be more likely to invite arrest than the blackcoated element, but figures suggest that resistance to the decrees have a political rather than a professional basis.

The 18 foreigners are to be expelled from the country forthwith. All the State employees, though released by the police, will have to submit to the regular disciplinary procedure of the services to which they are attached, and each case will be treated on its merits in the light of the police report and the demonstrator's personal record. Delegates of the Confederation Generale du Travail, accompanied by Civil servants' representatives, were received by the Minister of the Interior; they urged that the arrested State employees should not be subjected to disciplinary action, but the Minister could make no promise of this kind. The Civil servants' delegates afterwards issued a violent protest against any punishment of their members.

The railwaymen have decided to open a propaganda campaign by poster and pamphlet against the decrees. Gas workers are looking to the Confederation Generale du Travail for support. The delegates of the Paris transport workers are to meet tomorrow evening, and those of the postal and telegraph services are also meeting tomorrow.

The Communist C.G.T.U. is trying to take the lead in all the demonstrations against the Government and has called a mass meeting for Tuesday evening, when an attempt will be made to organize the resistance of Civil servants and pensioners under Communist leadership.

Ex-Soldiers And Communists

The ex-soldiers are still considering what form their protest against the reduction of pensions shall take. Further meetings are being held for this purpose. The impressions noted on Friday that the activity of the Communists is embarrassing to the ex-soldiers, and will, if persisted in, cause a split in their ranks, have been swiftly confirmed. Delegates of the Paris group of the Union Nationale des Combattants, which represents the Right wing of the movement, have unanimously decided to take no further part in the demonstrations organized by the National Federation, as whose mass meeting at the Salle Bullier on Friday night the official speakers were practically silenced by shouts of "Les Soviets partout" and the singing of the "Internationale."

The Union Nationale delegates, under the leadership of M. Lebecq, a stalwart Nationalist, who, after being defeated by a Socialist in the Paris municipal elections, was recently elected for the suburb of Neuilly with the support of M. Chiappe and the Croix de Feu, described the Salle Bullier meeting as having "surpassed all others in provocation, coarseness, and insults to the country," and have called on their national council to break off all relations with the federal body.

While functionnaires and ex-soldiers protest against the decrees, ordinary rent payers and consumers of coal, gas, and electricity (if they can, indeed, be distinguished from the rest) find some of M. Laval's measures much to their liking. The Congress of the National Federation of Electrified Communities has addressed to M. Laurent-Eynac, the Minister of Public Works, a telegram of congratulation on the elaborate decree by which the cost of electricity is reduced while contracts for the supply of electricity are simplified.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

A Record In Cannibalism

King Muwo of Rossel Island, in the Louisiade Archipelago, Melanesia, began his cannibalistic exploits in boyhood. He first ate his own playmates, as a punishment for their playfully bespattering him with mud. When he grew older, he organized rowing regattas, and ate all those who bested him in the competition. When he came to the throne, in 1840, his chief government occupation was again cannibalism. He ate his wives and subjects without any partiality. In 1851, a Chinese commercial vessel was wrecked on the barrier reef of Cape Desolation on his island. Muwo, who was overjoyed at the prospect of a change in racial diet, made the eating of Chinese a Crown Monopoly, and forbade any of his subjects to feast on the castaways. He ate the 85 passengers, all by himself. The total number of humans he assimilated in this manner was 941.

20,000 Billard Shots

On the Navy Pier, Chicago, as a feature of the Boat and Sports Show, May 5-12, 1935, Charles Peterson, well-known billiard artist, served 20,000 points at straight rail billiards unfinished against time in 101 minutes and 8 seconds, breaking his own previous record of 12,247, made in St. Louis in 1930. In his 15th session, Peterson also served 2,000 points in the record breaking time of 7 minutes and 21 seconds, or at the rate of 100 points every 22 seconds. Another feature of the exhibition was shooting a standard ivory billiard ball down the concrete runway of the pier. Peterson drove the ball 334 feet 2 inches.

Sweden Passes Bill To Control War Industries

A bill has been put through the Chamber of Deputies in Sweden which gives that country control of her industries. Also it bars foreign capital from investment in this branch of Sweden's industrial activity.

One of the disclosures made in the presentation in this bill was that out of the 198,000 shares of Boford A. B. 63,000 belonged to Krupp in Essen; in Bofors-Nebelkrutt the German holdings were still larger.

"The peaceful spirit of Sweden," stated M. Hansoon who presented the bill, "on the one hand, and foreign political considerations, on the other hand, make it necessary for Sweden to put an end to this state of matters, and she must also make it impossible for foreign interests to hide back of Swedish straw men."

Greece Tightens Laws Regarding Naturalization

Population Of Country Today Six Times What It Was 80 Years Ago

The acquisition of Greek citizenship is to be made more difficult for foreigners, the Minister of the Interior at Athens announced recently.

Since 1856, anyone wishing to take out Greek naturalization papers merely registered his application with the municipality in which he lived and after waiting three years automatically became a full-fledged Greek, according to the Christian Science Monitor's correspondent who says:

Today, the population of Greece is six times what it was 80 years ago, when that simple law was passed. After the Asia-Minor debacle of 1922, when the Greek armies were overwhelmed by the Turkish forces, over 1,500,000 Greek refugees from Anatolia were transplanted to Greece with the help of the League of Nations.

In addition there is now a good deal of unemployment, and the country is still helping to support some 35,000 Armenian and other refugees. Many of these refugees want to become Greek citizens.

Under the new nationality law a simple declaration is no longer valid. Henceforth every application will be minutely examined by the Ministry of the Interior, who will give his personal decision in every case. As for the Armenians, much the best thing for them, it is felt here, would be to send them back to Armenia, in Soviet Russia. The Armenian Government has repeatedly declared its willingness to receive as many as 50,000 refugees, as there is a great demand for labor both in industry and agriculture.

In 1927, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, great Norwegian humanitarian and internationalist, investigated the settlement possibilities in and around Erivan, Armenia's capital, and reported them to the League as most suitable. International political considerations, however, prevented the League from issuing a loan with which to finance the work of transportation and settlement.

Today, it is urged here, Russia is a member of the League, and the difficulties in the way of an international loan no longer exist. Therefore, Greeks now say, it is up to the 60 League governments.

Reds Would Back Anti-Fascist War

International Holds Proletariat Should Fight With Bourgeoisie To Bar Nazi Aggression

World Communism's old slogan, "Turn imperialist war into civil war," which bound Communists in capitalist countries to turn on their own governments in case of war, has been shelved by the Communist International, now holding its seventh congress here.

Because of what is regarded as the acute menace of Fascist Germany, a new and radically different strategy has been adopted for use if Germany should make war. This was disclosed today in editorials in the Soviet press and in the publication of the "keynote speech" made on the July 26 session by Wilhelm Pieck, leader of the German Communist party, in behalf of the executive committee of the Communist International.

Would Bar Gains by Fascism

This strategy is in line with the new policy for a united front with the more moderate elements in capitalist countries, as disclosed in Moscow on July 25 according to Harold Denny in the New York Times. It is briefly this:

If Fascist Germany attacks any small country—and this probably means Lithuania, Latvia, Czechoslovakia and, possibly, Austria—the Communists in the country attacked will join with the bourgeoisie in an effort to repel such a German attack. A war to prevent Fascist encroachment will be viewed by Communists as a "just war," even though waged by a bourgeois State.

How great an about-face this constitutes in the policy of the world revolutionary party is shown by reference to declarations of the sixth Communist International Congress in 1928, which obligated Communists in capitalist countries to sabotage war efforts. Less than two years ago the executive committee of the International, or Comintern, declared:

"In fighting against war Communists must prepare even now for the transformation of imperialist war into civil war and concentrate forces in each country at vital parts of the war machine of imperialism.

"In addition to increased agitation, Communist parties must by all means in their power insure the practical organization of mass action [preventing the shipping of arms and troops, hindering the execution of orders for belligerent countries, organizing demonstrations against military manoeuvres, &c.] and must intensify political educational work in the army and navy."

Mr. Pieck's address, which opened the congress after Joseph Stalin had been vociferously cheered as the "leader of the world proletariate," elaborated the new united front policy.

"In those countries where remnants of parliamentary government and democratic freedom remain," Mr. Pieck said, "the proletariat still has a chance, though a pitiful and trifling one, to organize and openly defend its class interests, despite the heavy oppression of the capitalist system.

"Where there is a Fascist dictatorship the proletariat is deprived even of the most insignificant rights and opportunity legally to defend its class interests. Therefore, we Communists will fight whole-heartedly to retain every ounce of democratic freedom in company with those who have held in some degree to the principles of bourgeois democracy in order to increase these liberties and with them as a basis to wage a struggle for genuine democracy and for wiping out the exploitation of man by man.

"We are ready to defend the remnants of parliamentarianism and democracy together with the real adherents of buorgeois democracy against fascism in order to fight for proletarian democracy.

"If German fascism attacks the national independence and unity of small independent States in Europe a war waged by the national bourgeoisie of these State will be a just war, in which proletarians and Communists cannot avoid taking part."

Italian Policy Scored

MOSCOW, July 26.—The Seventh Communist International Congress cheered loudly at bitter attacks on German Nazis, Italian Fascists and Japanese militarists. Wilhelm Pieck, German Communist leader, accused the Nazis of preparing to war against Europe's small democracies.

Mr. Pieck bitterly assailed the Italians for their policy in Africa and lashed out at the Japanese for their encroachment upon China. Loud applause greeted his statement that the most important choice facing humanity today was that between fascism and communism.

Chow Ho-sing, representative of the Chinese Red Army, told the meeting the laboring people of China yould "never consent to become colonial salves."

Among the delegates was Mme. Nadejda Krupskaya, widow of Nikolai Lenin.

Ferrara Plays Cuban Politics From US Exile

His Revived Interest In The Liberal Party Annoys Group And Radical Foes

Dr. Orestes Ferrara, Cuban political leader and statesman of the Machado regime, whose custody the National Sanctions Court is eager to obtain to try him on charges of malfeasances in office, is back with both feet in the political ring, even though he is still an exile in the United States.

The principal effect of Dr. Ferrara's re-entry on the Cuban political scene was to stir up a hornet's nest in the Liberal party, of which General Gerardo Machado was once the acclaimed standard bearer, according to the New York Times. Cheering for the party from Miami sidelines at a banquet given in his honor by exiled Liberals, Dr. Ferrara asserted:

"Personally, I don't think that the elections was to be held, but we are ready, and I firmly believe we shall be victorious. At this time, those of us who are away from the mother country are willing to accept the Presidential candidate that the party picks. Miguel Mariano Gomez and Carlos Manuel de la Cruz, are the two candidates."

The use of the pronoun "we" provoked immediate resentment in Havana, not alone among Liberals, but in other quarters as well—especially among revolutionaries, who, with the growing power of the Liberal party, see fading their hopes of ending the old party rule in Cuba.

Ramon Casconcelos, president of the Liberal party, denied Dr. Ferrara's right to speak for the party, but after Vasconcelos's indignation had been spent, Dr. Ferrara, in a letter and a cablegram to Havana newspapers, asserted that he was acting as the representative of Vasconcelos in the United States, and that he possessed a letter of credentials.

Several weeks ago the Cuban State Department was putting the finishing touches on documents to be sent to Washington requesting the extradition of Dr. Ferrara. Other companions of Dr. Ferrara in the United States, who served under Machado in the Cabinet, in the Senate and Chamber of Representatives and in other posts, are under accusation in the Sanctions Court here.

At least one of Dr. Ferrara's colleagues in the Machado Cabinet, Dr. Octavio Zubizarreta, who was Secretary of Interior, is in Cabanas fortress under death sentence with a score or more of Machado's "porristas."

Dr. Ferrara stood with Machado to the very end of the latter's regime. He fled on airplane for Miami August 12, 1933.

League Failure Affects Prestige

South America Points To Own Peace Agreement As Showing Way To Europe

Reaction in Santiago press and diplomatic circles to the Buenos Aires Chaco peace agreement reveals it as something of a blow to League of Nations prestige in South America.

Although the Chilean Foreign Office insisted Chile was acting within the framework of the League, the agreement once obtained was quickly seized upon as a victory for the American continent in showing the way to the Old World, according to a recent article in the New York Herald Tribune.

A fe wtypical quotations show the feeling which prevailed there:

Former President Hernando Siles of Bolivia, now Minister to Chile:

"I believe that the resolution adopted that only American countries should participate in the definite solution of the problem is of prime importance.....Just as Europe does not need our intervention, we do not ask Europe's to bring about harmony here."

Minister Rogelio Ibara, of Paraguay:

"I am happy for another victory of the protocol—the complete and absolute participation of America. Perhaps the negotiators had in mind the fact of Paraguay's having left the League of Nations..... Europe is very far away. Its peace organisms are more bureaucratic than effective. Under such circumstances nothing could be more wrong than to think of them as pointing the way to a solution."

"El Diario Illustrado" commented:

"Chile's President saw that the efforts of the League of Nations were exhausted and took up the task with decision without going outside the framework of the League of Nations."

Britishers Ask For Slot Machine To Meet Law

Under the present system there is great opportunity for "bootlegging" in England. It is to Britain's credit that these opportunities are not taken.

The opportunities spoken of are those made possible through difficulties in the law. One might imagine a razor bootlegger, stealthily selling razors to Englishmen at 9:15 p.m., or a tinned-salmon baron hawking his goods at dead of night, or a toothbrush twister, handing out toothbrushes to those who call at his toothbrush speakeasy and say the right password.

Alas, these fine opportunities are not taken. Perhaps Englishmen do not understand bootlegging. Or maybe it is just so much easier to wait until the shop opens in the morning.

Moscow's Plan Calls For City Of 5,000,000

Private Houses Must Go, Making Way For Tall Apartment Buildings

The rulers of Soviet Russia have decided that a population of 5,000,000 persons is the absolute limit for a comfortable modern city, and therefore have laid down a 10-year plan for reconstruction of Moscow, which assumes that the population of their capital will never exceed that number. By the passport system which regulates the movements of all Soviet citizens, the dictatorship will be able to control the growth of Moscow in future, as it does at present.

The ruling Communist Party in Russia has changed its original ideas about the size of cities. At one time party leaders believed that industrial workers should be assembled in a few great urban centers, larger than any the world has known, according to the Christian Science Monitor. But recently decentralization has become a party policy; Russia's rulers have undertaken to prevent the headlong growth of great cities as well as to break up gigantic state trusts and unwieldy state and collective farms in the interest of more efficient operation.

Restrictions in Force

Without such regulation, the population of Moscow probably would already exceed 5,000,000. During famine years, hungry country people would have overwhelmed Moscow, where food always has been available since 1922.

Ambitious persons of all occupations prefer to live and work in Moscow, close to the rulers who control the "patronage" of the vast state political and industrial machine. Moscow's superior universities, theaters, factories, all have attracted the most ambitious men and women.

So the ruling group has been compelled to restrict severely the influx into Moscow. It has become constantly more difficult to obtain permission to live in the capital; hundreds of central offices have been broken up and their personnel shipped to the provinces. The political police regularly expel those who can offer no good excuse for remaining in the city. But only this summer was an official decree issued explaining that Moscow's population is permanently limited to 5,000,000. Over the 10-year period preparations will be made for an additional 1,000,000 persons and no more.

To Add Suburbs

The Party Central Committee has rejected two fantastic proposals; one suggested that present-day Moscow should be preserved as a "museum of the old order," and a new city construoted on a near-by site; the other proposed that the present city should be completely destroyed and a "socialist" city erected on the ruins. The present ruling faction is too conservative to consider such schemes seriously.

The plan now adopted provides for the rapid improvement of Moscow, with an increase in the city's area from 71,000 to 150,000 acres over a 10-year period, by the addition of new suburbs. The greatest suburb, covering 40,000 acres, will be hills bordering the Moscow River, which is considered the most desirable residential site.

Within 10 years the Party proposes to destroy all buildings less than six stories high, so that no "private house" will remain in Moscow. All new buildings will range from six to 14 stories in height. The population will be distributed 400 to the hectare (2.5 acres) except along the great central boulevards which will be lined with tall apartment houses acconimodating 500 persons to the hectare.

Moscow's waterways—the Moscow River, the Yauza River, and the drainage canal—will serve as the city's main arteries. They will be lined with granite embankments and 120-foot boulevards will be constructed on either side. All old buildings along the waterways will be replaced with new apartment houses and office buildings.

These waterways will become much more important when the Moscow-Volga canal is completed at the end of 1937. More than 100,000 prisoners, political and otherwise, are now working on this canal. Through the canal steamers up to 6000 tons will connect the center of Moscow with the great Volga River and the Caspian Sea. The Volga's waters also will provide a vast new water supply for the capital.

The plan provides for complete reconstruction of much of the present center. The Red Square facing the Kremlin will be doubled in width by the destruction of solid blocks of buildings, but the Kremlin and the Church of St. Basil will be left intact. All narrow streets will be widened, and the so-called "Chinese City" with its ancient walls already is being rapidly destroyed.

In construction of new suburbs, ample provision is being made for parks. Pine forests encircle Moscow, and to create parks it is necessary only to preserve some of these beautiful forests. These preserves are to be connected with the city's center of "belts of greenery."

The detailed 10-year plan now adopted by the Party anticipates that Moscow can be made a "model city" within a decade if the population is limited to 5,000,000. It provides "model" facilities only for that number. But this plan makes Moscow more desirable than ever to millions of Soviet citizens who already look longingly toward the capital. To keep the population within the stipulated limit, it appears inevitable that present passport regulations must be permanently enforced.

Americans Prefer Small Ships

Rengo

NEW YORK,—American shipping men are not at all overawed by the size of the new French liner, Normandie. In fact, they prefer smaller ships. Vessels like the Normandie, they say, according to the New York Times, are too large for practical purposes. Ships of the 30,000 tons class, they hold, are better suited for modern trans-Atlantic travel, both because they are more efficient to operate and because they afford greater opportunity for conviviality among the passengers.

Plans are now under consideration for the construction of another ship similar to the Manhattan and the Washington, according to a statement by Mr. P. A. S. Franklin, President of the Roosevelt International Mercantile Marine Company. The new vessel will augment the United States Lines service between New York, England, France and Germany. Other ships will be added as rapidly as conditions warrant.

There is little likelihood of any American line, other than the United States Lines, building new passenger ships at present. The luxury ship, Leviathan, owned by the United States Lines, is tied up in dock and will probably never return to service. The Manhattan and the Washington, on the other hands, continue to operate with profitable passenger lists.

They are scheduled to leave Yokohama aboard the N.Y.K. liner Tatsuta Maru on August 22. The coming meeting is to start on September 15 at New Orleans, Louisiana, under the auspices of the United States Veterans' Association and will last for a week.

In the course of luncheon Mr. F. Schneider, Director of Ahrens and Co. in Tokyo, gave a welcome speech, expressing delight in the humber of guests present. This was followed by Governor Ishida's address, in which he said:

"On behalf of your Japanese guests, I wish to thank you for your most kind hospitality today and for the opportunity afforded us of inaugurating this manificent liner, in which you rightly take great pride.

"The presence of the Potsdam at rest for the first time in Yokohama harbor after her maiden trip to the Far East from the port of Hamburg, is a memorable occassion. May we join with you, H. Ahrens and Co., agent of the Nord Deutscher Lloyd, and with the German community in Japan in rejoicing in this fact.

"For the Potsdam symbolizes to all the faith which the German nation has in its destiny on the high seas of commerce and the confidence of German business, despite the gloom of world economic depression, in the future of international trade. The Potsdam is thus the embodiment of German vision and of courage, as well as of technical achievement, and hence is an inspiration to all men.

"It is with special warmth, therefore, that we welcome the presence of the Potsdam in Yokohama harbor. We hope that she may may long continue to traverse majestically the great waters which extend between your country and ours, its voyages in the service of mankind weaving back and forth if we may so put it a fabric of ever increasing understanding and mutual benefit between your great nation and ours.

"Gentlemen: May I request my fellow Japanese guests to rise and drink a toast to the health and prosperity of our hosts and to the ever continued success of this great vessel on which we are gathered today."

English Schools Stir Comment By OTC Maneuvers

10,000 Of Britain's Boyhood Go Under Canvas For Military Training July 30

On July 30 some 10,000 of the flower of Britain's boyhood went under canvas for their annual spell of military training with all the realism of tanks, armored cars, guns, rifles and airplanes.

For nine days the junior O. T. C.'s (Officers Training Corps) have the assistance of the regular army in putting into practice the maneuvers learned on school parade grounds during the year, says the London correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, whose article follows:

But today there is a challenge to his hitherto accepted part of youth's education. The growing cry for means of securing peace has set some people questioning the wisdom of this war instruction for boys of the impressionable age of from 15 to 19.

Several recent events also have contributed to make the desirability of the O. T. C.'s in their present from a live issue. In one case the Prince of Wales has caused much controversy by a speech to boys of Berkhampstead School in which he strongly supported their corps training and referred to those opposed to the movement as "misguided people" or "cranks." His remarks called forth stern protests from many, including Mr. George Lansbury, leader of the Labor Party.

Several newspapers, too, took the unusual course of censuring the Prince's speech. The News-Chronicle commented that the royal spokesman had shown "less than his usual tact and good sense." The Manchester Guardian declared that the Prince spoke with imperfect understanding of that large body of opinion which favored discipline and training in the schools, but without the introduction of military ideas, military regimentation and military instruments.

Another incident has focused public attention on the O. T. C.'s. It concerns Reading school and is considered by many to show the deep-rooted hold, admitting of no criticism, that the military tradition has in the schools. On the occasion of a recent inspection of the corps by a War Office representative, anti-war pamphlets were distributed. Behind this action were found to be three former members of the school. They were subsequently summoned before the headmaster and requested to apologize and undertake not to repeat this propaganda. They refused to sign a statement to this effect and were threatened with expulsion from the Old Boys Society.

Accurate assessment of the true influence of the O. T. C.'s on young boys is difficult to reach. But insight into the activities of the organization helps in hazarding a guess.

Rifle-Fire Does It

The schools provide the junior and the universities the senior sections of the O. T. C.'s which are subsidized by the Government partly on the basis of proficiency in rifle fire. Officers for the territorial army, which is Britain's second line of national defense, are recruited from the O. T. C.'s. Membership of school corps is voluntary, but in many cases there is virtual obligation.

A high standard of training is achieved. Boys can rise to the rank of sergeant in charge of platoons and in some schools to credit officers. Promotion is determined by the passing of an examination for Certificate "A," which in effect entitles the holder to a commission in the Territorial Army in the event of war. In entaile a knowledge of battlefield tactics, rifle and machine gun firing, besides drilling. Efficiency of the O. T. C.'s is checked by periodical inspections by regular army officers.

At the annual camp, the training reaches a high degree of reality. Operations are assisted by regular soldiers, blank ammunition is issued to all ranks. Tanks, airplanes, armored cars, cavalry units introduce boys to the excitement of real action. Field days are organized with the schools divided up into friend and foe. Rivalry runs high, as on the playing fields. But instead of defending a goal mouth or a cricket wicket, the boys blaze away their blank ammunition at each other in a deafening roar of fire and "mow each other's ranks down" with machine guns.

Thrills

These boys certainly get a taste of all the excitement of warfare without the appalling consequences of live ammunition and all the other horrible accompaniments of actual action.

And how do they react to this military preparation? Many seem to regard it all just as part of school life. The pretense of killing fellow members of the school and boys from other schools has little reality. It is more like a game and as such is to a large extent enjoyed.

But there are many others to whom the whole training is a drudgery, with its object distasteful. Some parents object. They may succeed in getting their sons exempted. Others find that it is better to allow them to go through with it lest they be labeled "soft."

Who can say that a subtle impregnation of war sense is not taking place in the class of boy from whom the nation's leaders are later largely recruited?

Mexican Public Backs Ouster Of Tabasco Dictator

Capital Mass Meetings, Led By Intellectuals, Cheer Cardenas

Public opinion regards President Cardenas' decision to replace the state government of Tabasco as his most decisive victory since he has taken office, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Indignation against the internal conflicts in Tabasco has been growing steadily during the 16 years that Tomas Garrido Canabal, former State Governor, ex-Secretary of Agriculture and political boss, has remained in power. This was culminated by the killing of four students during a skirmish in Villahermosa last week where they had gone, as part of a well-organized group of exiled Tabascans, to reclaim the land of their fathers.

The manifestation which took place in Mexico City the day of their public funeral was one of the largest ever held here. Every creed and belief was represented, including 300 American students from the Summer School of the Mexico University who marched beneath a banner of Justice. The various speeches made by well-known intellectuals revolved around one vital point: What attitude would Cardenas take?

Government Held Unconstitutional

The answer was revealed in the communication which the President directed to the Permanent Commission of Congress. In this he requested that the present Tabasco government be set aside owing to the fact that its actions were entirely "unconstitutional." Gen. Aureo L. Calles was immediately named provisional governor and the state was placed under military control until the present situation is fully resolved.

A giant manifestation took place in Tabasco as soon as the news was spread. Men, women and children celebrated the end of Garrido Canabal's regime, which his enemies have called, one of "bloody tyranny." Garrido was falsely rumored to have been assassinated, but he had merely left the state. He will probably settle in the United States or Europe. His plans, however, have not yet been made public.

The State of Tabasco has always presented difficulties for the Federal Government owing to the fact that it is so situated to the south of the country that it can only be reached by water across the Gulf of Mexico. In recent years an air route has been opened but until the contemplated Mexico-Yucatan railroad is built, which will pass through the State, Tabasco is virtually cut off from the Mexican capital. This explains the fact that Garrido was able to remain in power for so many years despite public protests on the part of the Tabascans.

Students Support President

No sooner had the notice reached the press and the first "extras" appeared on the street than a mass meeting of law students and alumni gathered in the auditorium of the University to pledge a vote of adhesion to the President. Alejandro Diaz Walls, president of the Society of Alumni of the Law School, stated in his speech that President Cardenas was the only leader in many years who listened to public appeal and was willing to govern in accord with its necessities.

The Committee for the Liberation of Tabasco, which already has had four of its members killed, addressed a telegram to Cardenas expressing gratitude for his prompt decision. Rodulfo Brito Foucher, well-known lawyer, leader of the expedition and brother of one of the students killed, said in part, "Let us hope that the future will give us the opportunity to repay the debt we owe you as Tabascans and as men. Tabasco owes its liberty to our four comrades who gave their lives to save their home state." He then quoted the words of one of the wounded boys who is still fighting for his life, "It does not matter if I die as long as the rest of you triumph."

wealthy, the church, and the state to open their treasuries for those who are hungry." Success of the Russian revolutionaries in confiscating church property was evidenced as an example.

These recommendations all came from the report of the executive committe of the Comintern, and were delivered by William Pieck, German delegate.

Contrasted with them is the pledge given by Mr. Litvinoff. He agreed: "To respect scrupulously the indisputable right of the United States to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way and to refrain from interfering in any manner in the internal affairs of the United States, its territories, or possessions."

Went Even Further

He further agreed:

"2. To refrain, and to restrain all persons in Government service and all organizations of the Government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act, overt or covert, liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order or security of the whole or any part of the United States or its possessions, and, in particular, from any act tending to encourage or incite armed intervention, or any agitation or propaganda having as an aim the violation of the territorial integrity of the United States, its territories and possessions, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories or possessions."

Avenue Open for Soviet

Whether the Soviet Union has violated its pledge to refrain from inciting overthrow of the American Government turns as it has before on the precise relation of the U. S. S. R. and the Comintern. The latter is an international organization, and the most incendiary statements regarding Communist revolution in the United States were made by American citizens who are delegates to the meeting.

The Soviet Government may argue that it has no control over views uttered in its capital by American citizens, or Germans like William Pieck author of the Comintern report. It may plead the rights of free speech, and declare that equally incendiary demands for the overthrow of the Russian Government are daily occurrences on American soil.

There is some literal accuracy in these claims, it is well recognized at the State Department.

Cases Not Lacking

American organizations and speakers are frequently demanding the overthrow of Soviet Russia. Once in a while, an agent of the American Government makes such a claim. The most recent was in a newspaper article by a well-known Admiral, who urged an alliance with other nations in a military attack upon the Soviet Union. The Admiral was not disciplined, although naval authorities said his manuscript should have been submitted to them prior to publication.

Bremen Officers Blamed For Riot Aboard Ship

in the German note.

Not American Neglect

But the American Government, in its reply, adds these remarks:

"You will note that the police authorities took most extensive precautions in order to prevent any untoward incident; that having learned in advance that a demonstration was planned, they consulted with the representatives of the interested steamship companies and in co-operation with them took all measures which seemed calculated to assure order; and that the incident which actually occurred was in no sense due to neglect on the part of the American authorities.

Stresses Precautions Taken

"I invite particular attention to those sections of the report which indicate that a very considerable number of police were detailed to prevent disturbances; that the police suggested measures to prevent persons other than the passengers and other duly authorized visitors from boarding the vessel, but that the officers of the steamship line did not deem it necessary to adopt such measures; that unauthorized persons accordingly succeeded in boarding the steamer; that before the vessel sailed such elements started a demonstration; that police authorities took immedate and efficient action with a view to clearing the ship of all unauthorized persons; and that during the course of this action one of the police, namely, Detective Matthew Solomon, in attempting to apprehend the ringleaders, was set upon, knocked down, and sustained serious injury."

Ship Officials Warned

The police department's report, also forwarded to the German Embassy, sets forth the warning to the steamship officials given by the authorities as early as July 25. Capt. W. Dreschel, chief marine superintendent of the Hapag Line, says the report: "Stated that the matter had been taken care of and that the captain in charge of the S. S. Bremen would take charge of and police his vessel and that the pier would be policed by other private watchmen."

Emil Maurer, assistant marine superintendent "requested that the police not interfere with the persons coming onto the pier as he believed it might interfere with the regular routine business of the line.

"He also informed that his men were well able to take care of the ship, and that the crew was specially trained, etc. He further stated that if the police department would take care of the pier and the traffic conditions, the company would take care of the rest."

Despite these disclaimers, detectives were on board the ship, observed the Communists, and attempted to break up their attack upon the swastika flag.

The police report, signed by Acting Lieut. James A. Pyke of the radical squad, and indorsed by Lewis J. Valentine, police commissioner, concludes:

Blames Shipping Agents

"The officer submitting this report is of the opinion that the trouble aboard the S. S. Bremen would have been entirely avoided if the shipping agents had lived upon to their part of the proposed plan in this particular instance, which was to let no visitors aboard the ship unless they were only authenticated person and identified as such to the men who were especially assigned to this task.

"The fact that this set rule was not complied with was brought to the attention of Captain Drechsel, marine superintendent in charge of the Hamburg-American line, about a half-hour prior to the trouble aboard the ship, and it was due to the failure of the company's men assigned to the third-class gangway who were responsible for the Communists being able to board the vessel."

Texas To Spend Twenty Millions On Exposition

$2,000,000, passed by the House, is before the Senate. Private exploitation will make up the balance.

Texas, besides making a bid for the nation's attention next year, will celebrate the centennial of its independence from Mexico and its establishment as a republic, in which state is existed almost ten years before its admittance to the Union. Thus history will play an important part in the celebration. During the run of the fair, from June 6 through the year, separate but co-ordinated historic pageants at historic sites will relate the state's passage from serfdom to Spain and France and Mexico through independence to affiliation with the United States.

Houston and Austin, named for the state's heroes, will hold local celebrations; San Antonio will remember the Alamo, where the Texas defenders were wiped out; from the mountains to the lowlands, Texas will be a living history textbook.

Dallas, like San Diego borrowed from Chicago's staff for its executive personnel, including Colonel Franklin D. Bell, director of exhibits, and others. Walter D. Kline, former Mayor of Wichita Falls, Tex., and capitalist, will be managing director.

Mexico to Have Building

Every state and many foreign nations have been invited to participate. Mexico, celebrated in Texas history as an arch foe, will show its friendliness with an elaborate building of its own. With its year-around climates and strategic transportation advantages, Dallas expects 15,000,000 visitors and many permanent arrivals. For their benefit the fair will stress the variety of the state's industries—cattle, agriculture, minerals and oils and urban enterprises.

The three-shift construction of the fair grounds, and the employment the fair will produce later directly and indirectly, is expected to eradicate unemployment in Dallas and over a large tributary territory.

Because transportation has been so vital to Texas's development, it will have a featured spotlight at the exposition. The transportation building, exhibiting automotive, boat, rail and air travel, will have the place of honor.

Less formal will be the Arkansas 1936 celebration of its centennial as a state—it became the twenty-fifth state July 4, 1836. A legislative commission named in 1933 to plan an exposition found it impractical and thereupon was dissolved in favor of another commission to arrange state celebration.

Each County to Hold Celebration

The result will be seventy-five historic celebrations (one in each county), following a principal state observance at Little Rock, the capital, June 15. By exchange of historical and commercial pageants between the counties for the remainder of the year Arkansas hopes to keep up its interest to the outside. And in line with that it is planning one of its most ambitious public works programs.

Arkansas is an outdoor state—it has mountains, valleys, lowlands and prairie, but few cities. The state hopes to sell itself to the United States on that basis, with an elaborate chain of twelve or more recreation areas, financed by $1,250,000 of Federal works funds, that will cover every type of terrain suitable for vacationists.

"Our plan," said A. W. Parke, executive secretary of the Arkansas State Centennial Commission, at Little Rock, "is to build these pretentious, glorified tourist camps with every recreation feature we can find. There will be swimming pools, comfortable accommodations, hotel facilities, open fireplaces and tile showers for each room or cabin. The architecture will be appropriate to the locations and the buildings will be made of native materials—stone in the mountains, local woods in the lowlands.

"President Roosevelt, who is keenly interested in outdoor activities, has promised his support, and may provide C. C. C. labor in addition to Federal work funds. The camps, of course, will be self-liquidating because, although they will be built for our centennial visitors, they will be permanent. And enough Arkansas residents have agreed to use the camps for sufficient days to assure their financial success for a year."

Arkansas is laying out highways in consultation with Federal authorities to reach every section, as part of its campaign to sell itself as "the first state to establish itself as a recreation state principally."

Filling in between the tourist attractions and the historical pageants will be dinners for returning former residents—from Mary McCormick and Dick Powell to the Dean brothers—and musical programs. An operetta on Arkansas has been written by Lawrence Powell (no relation to Dick Powell), director of the Little Rock Symphony Orchestra.

Arkansas has worked out its celebration to fine detail. Now it is waiting for Congress to adjourn so its own Legislature may be called in special session to pass enabling legislation to utilize Federal funds.

The parade of state celebrations will not end in 1936. Two years later Los Angeles will hold an international exposition to celebrate the completion, in actual working form, of the Boulder Dam and related projects that will furnish 1,000,000 acre feet of water to the metropolitan water district of thirteen communities, doubling their supply.

In 1938 also San Francisco will hold a world fair to mark the opening of its two transbay bridges and other extensive public works now in construction.

If the proximity of two world fairs appears undue rivalry, perhaps San Franscisco is not to blame. In 1915, after San Francisco had won the state exposition, San Diego set up a rival fair to woo some of the patronage to southern California. The plant it built then is the home of its fair this year.

The exposition movement seemed headed, say those who are staging and planning them, to perpetuate itself indefinitely.

Hudson Tunnel Ends Meet 20 Feet Under New York River Bed

Midtown tunnel, the $37,500,000 project connecting Manhattan Island and Weehawken, N. J., was "holed through" on August 2 and the 400-ton steel shield that has been pushing a 32-foot path through bedrock and under-river silt for the last 14 months hit its mark virtually "on the dime", according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Completion of the first stage of the work was marked by ceremonies sponsored by the Port of New York authorities, which is in charge of the construction, says the Monitor's article which follows:

From the bottom of King's Bluff, on the Jersey side, 20 feet below the river bed, the great subterranean battering ram, supplemented with dynamite and the shoving power of a high-pressure hydraulic jacks, wavered on more than a fraction of an inch from the goal 5000 feet ahead. This was a 32-foot steel caisson sunk into the river bed at the foot of Thirty-Ninth Street, Manhattan.

Three weeks ago another shield working through the rocky ribs of Manhattan from Tenth Avenue bumped against the eastern face of the caisson. Each shove of the mightly pressure engine, whose slow and ponderous progress displaced 175,000 cubic yards of rock and earth and river muck, cleared the way for another giant iron ring of which the skeleton of the tunnel is made, and at the finish today 2370 of these had been placed Each weighs 22 tons.

With the completion of the boring operations today, the "sand hogs," whose job it was to do the actual excavation work and clear away the rock and debris that poured into the shield's capacious maw as it thrust forward, sat down to a feast on the surface at both ends of the tunnel.

According to Col. Charles S. Gleim, chief engineer of the project, the tube will be ready for traffic in the early winter of 1938. It is being financed by a federal public works allotment under grant to the Port of New York Authority.

Argentina Feting Anniversary Of Revolution Soon

Several Streets And One Town Renamed Seis de Septiembre

Argentina will shortly celebrate the fifth anniversary of what has come to be known as the "September Revolution", reports the Buenos Aires correspondent of The Times, London. It was hailed at the time as the dawn of a new era. Several streets and even one town were renamed Seis de Septiembre. The movement was led by a military chief, General Jose Uriburu, and an aged President was overthrown, almost without fighting. There were the elements of tragedy, for the President, Dr. Hipolito Irigoyen, was lying ill in his home when news of the revolution reached him, and was obliged to delegate his powers to the Vice-President of the Republic.

Argentina had a certain political tradition. A Radical administration had been in office continuously since 1916, first under Dr. Irigoyen, subsequently under Dr. Marcelo de Alvear, and again under Dr. Irigoyen. The country was solidly Radical, with the exception of the city of Buenos Aires, which had long been a Socialist stronghold. The Irigoyen regime was accused by its enemies of inficiency, corruption, and extravagance. No aspersions were cast upon the personal character of the President; his friends admitted that the President's age rendered it difficult for him to guide the country through the economic crisis then beginning. Although the revolutionaries of September belonged chiefly to the extreme Right, by a strange irony the Socialists of Buenos Aires contributed indirectly to the success of the rising. Elsewhere in the Republic there would have been a rally to the Radical cause; Buenos Aires was apathetic, or openly hostile, to the existing Administration. The Vice-President appealed to the Army, but abandoned resistance when it became evident that the armed forces favored the Revolution.

General Justo In Office

General Uriburu was more soldier than statesman. In April of the following year elections took place for the appointment of the Governor of the Province of Buenos Aires, and resulted in a Radical victory, whereupon General Uriburn cancelled the elections. He was shrewd enough, however, to realize that the country would not accept permanently an oligarchy of the Right and decided to pursue a middle course. He did not seek election to the Presidency; but agreed to support the candidature of General Agustin P. Justo, who had participated with him in the September Revolution, but who had formerly been Minister for War in the Radical Cabinet of President Alvear. The Irigoyenist Radicals, protesting against the violence of September and the annulment of the provincial elections, boycotted the polls. After the general election of November, 1931, General Justo took office as President in February 1932. The Radicals might have been permitted to contest the election as a party, but only under new leaders, for clearly those in power would not have accepted so soon a return to the Presidency of Dr. Irigoyen or one of his nominees.

The new Federal Government was formed by a coalition styled the Concordancia, which included among others the National Democrats (Conservatives) and some of the Anti-Personalist Radicals. The latter section had broken away from the main body, and while professing Radical principles repudiated the leadership of Dr. Irigoyen. The Socialists went into opposition. The Irigoyensists abstained, refusing to recognize the regime. Dr. de Alvear, who was in Europe at the time of the Revolution, was for a time associated with the Anti-Personalist Radicals, but later, having seen the political errors of General Uriburu, tried to bring together the two wings of the Radical Party.

Radicals Reunited

General Uriburu died in April, 1932, and little more than a year later, in July, 1933, Dr. Irigoyen followed him to the grave. With the disappearance of both the victor and vanquished of September the way was clear for new political alignments. These were delayed by an abortive Radical rising in the provinces at the end of 1933, followed by the sending of ex-President Alvear into exile. He was permitted to return some months later, and towards the end of 1934 two important changes occurred in the policy of the Radical Party. There was first a movement in favor of re-uniting with the anti-Personalists, and secondly, the decision to abandon the boycott of elections. These two changes could scarcely have occurred had Dr. Irigoyen been living. Shortly afterwards, the re-united Radicals won two victories in provincial elections in Tucuman and Entre Rios. These successes were in themselves unimportant, but were significant as straws in the wind and showed that in spite of the September Revolution Argentina was still a Radical country.

So far, however, the two wings have only been able to cooperate on occasions. In April last when an election was held for a Senator for the Federal Capital it was not apparently possible to put up a Radical candidate who would please both sections. In the absence of a candidate of their own party the majority of the Radical electors cast their votes for the Socialist, who won the election with nearly six times as many votes as those given to the Concordancia (or Government) candidate.

The September Revolution has altered little in the general political complexion of Argentina. With free elections the Radicals under Dr. Alvear would almost surely again sweep the contry. In Argentina, excepting the city of Buenos Aires, it is men rather than parties or principles who count in politics. Since the death of ex-President Irigoyen Dr. Alvear is the outstanding political figure. September had one lasting effect the development of political and economic nationalism in Argentina. But it is difficult to say how far this has been due to a similar growth in other countries resulting from the world depression and to what extent it was the product of the Revolution. From the latter sprang a number of Nationalist and Fascist organizations, the chief of which is the Legion Civica (Civic Legion), whose leader is Colonel Kinkelen, one of the "men of September" and former military secretary of General Uriburu. The Argentine Fascists, although active, are not strong numerically. Yet they have stimulated other parties to become more nationalist for fear of appearing to neglect the country's welfare.

The agricultural character of Argentina has made politics almost feudal. There is no real confidence in the party system, or in the principles of popular government, and this was mentioned by President Justo in a recent message to the Congress. There, is however, always a strong undercurrent of democracy. There may be abuses and elections may be "arranged" rather than freely voted. But there are also denunciations and exposures. And the lack of discipline characteristic of a country newly populated militates against dictatorship.

Should the Radicals return to power a repetition of the events of September is scarcely possible. Too much has happened, too many persons have died, and five years is a long time in the history of a South American Republic.

NY Museum Asks $398,757 Budget

Metropolitan Wants $36,194 Increase, Citing Need For Additional Employes

The Metropolitan Museum of Art of New York City asked recently for an increase of $36,194 in its 1936 budget to enlarge its staff, with the explanation that it now has only one watchman to guard valuable paintings and art works in three galleries.

Dr. Herbert Winlock, director of the museum, and Frank Dunn, its auditor, appeared before Budget Director R. E. McGaheh and Leo J. McDermott, his assistant, to support the request, says that New York Times. The increase sought is entirely for personnel and is included in a total request for $398,757.

The museum wants four additional watchmen at $1,620, ten additional attendants at $1,440, two electricians, two stationary engineers, four firemen and two laborers. Dr. Winlock explained that the city had cut the museum's appropriation 20 per cent two years ago and 10 per cent last year. Endowments and revenues are decreasing, he said, but the attendance rose by 10 per cent last year. With an expected attendance of at least 1,300,000 next year, he stressed the need for protection of the museum's treasures.

The city pays one-quarter of the maintenance cost of the museum, which is upon city land. In 1933 cuts in the city's appropriation forced the museum to place fifty-three employes on its own payroll entirely.

Dr. John A. Merrill, director of the New Work Botanical Garden, asked an increase of $45,853 in his total request of $254,968. Greenhouse repairs estimated at $32,200 could be dropped from the budget by having the work done by the Federal Public Works Administration, Mr. McDermott said. Dr. Merrill, who is leaving the New York Botanical Garden to assume charge of the Harvard Botanical Garden, agreed that $31,000 could be saved by that step.

Dr. Roy Chapman Andrews, director of the American Museum of Natural History, sought an increase of $85,356 in a total request for $484,501.

The New York Zoological Society appealed for $5,816 additional next year for the Aquarium and $8,554 more for the Zoological Garden. The total request for the Aquarium was $73,068 and for the Zoological Garden $270,037.92.

Philip N. Youtz, director of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, asked $269,723 for the central museum, an increase of $54,962, and $52,017.50 for the children's museum, or $13,063.50 more than this year's allotment.

Sweden Considers Use Of Right-Hand Traffic

Substitution of right-hand traffic for the left hand routing now in use is being urged in Sweden as a safety measure. The claim is made that foreign tourists, especially those from the United States, become confused with resultant accidents according to the New York Herald Tribune. Both Norway and Denmark now have right-hand traffic.

Cost of the change has been estimated at from eight to nine million kronor, as most of the buses and trolley cars would have to be rebuilt and switches and platforms changed.

Wang Ching-wei Calls Peiping Chief To South

Wang Ko-min's Trip Expected To Have Bearing On Sino-Japanese Relations

Rengo

PEIPING, August 24—Keen attention was focused here today on the sudden departure for Nanking this afternoon of Mr. Wang Ko-min, acting chairman of the Peiping Political Council, reportedly in response to a summons from Mr. Wang Ching-wei, President of the Executive Yuan and Foreign Minister of the Nanking Government, who withdrew his resignation last Thursday.

In view of the fact that Mr. Wang Ching-wei has been provided with extended powers of administration by the Standing Committee of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang, it is understood that Mr. Wang Ko-min, during his projected conversations with the Executive Yuan head at Nanking, will be given important instructions especially with regard to China's policies towards Japan.

In the meantime, well-informed quarters here point out that the Sixth Plenary Session of the Peiping Political Council, which is scheduled for August 22, will be postponed until the beginning of September, as the acting chairman is expected to return here at the end of this month.

Mr. Wang Ko-min, during his stay in Nanking, it is further understood, will also hold conversations with General Huang Fu, Minister of the Interior and chairman of the Peiping Political Council.

Discovery Scores In Wilson Stakes

Shatters Mark For Event In Beating Identify, Stablemate, By Five Lengths

By BRYAN FIELD

N. Y. Times

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. J., July 31.—Alfred Gwynee Vanderbilt's Discovery, outstanding star of the handicap division, took the $3,000 added Wilson Stakes in stride today at the Spa, setting a new record for the event, and sending his winnings for the year to $64,840, second only to those of the 3-year-old champion Omaha.

Roundly cheered by a large midweek crowd, the chestnut son of Display strode through the stretch powerfully to score in a gallop. Yet he was timed in 1:37 1-5 for the mile over a fast track.

Former Governor Alfred E. Smith presented the trophy to Mr. Vanderbilt and congratulated him on Discovery's performance, which was the more notable in that he started five lengths behind his two rivals. One of these was his stablemate, Identify, and the other was Mrs. Dodge Sloane's Phychic Bid. The entry ruled at the prohibitive price of 1 to 10 and there was little betting on the outcome.

Discovery Carries 126 Pounds

At the finish, Discovery was first by five lengths under his scale weight of 126 pounds. Identify landed the place by a head under 122, while Psychic Bid was third, with 122. The latter is a 3-year-old, while his two rivals are a year older. The test grossed $4,525, of which $3,475 was added to Discovery's total.

There really was nothing to the race except a public trial for Discovery, possibly for the Saratoga Handicap, Saturday's feature, and other future events. Whether or not Discovery will start on Saturday is doubtfull, as his impost will be 139 pounds. The highest ever carried by Man o' War was 138 pounds in the Potomac Handicap in Maryland and he won under it.

It is more probable that Discovery will skip the handicap on Saturday, run here in another condition event such as that today, and then move on for the Narragansett Special, a test which is being made to order for the handicap star, inasmuch as Omaha will not start in it.

When the field got away after a minute at the post Identify was winging in front and Phychic Bid was in close pursuit. Bejshak got Discovery into stride without hurrying him and moved after the field down the straightaway of the backstretch. Approaching the far turn, he picked up the pair in front with the greatest of ease. He went on as he pleased thereafter and scored easily.

At the top of the stretch Psychic Bid appeared to have Identify beaten for the place, but the latter outfinished the 3-year-old. Leaving Discovery aside, there was much informal betting as to whether Identify or Psychic Bid would get the place. The old mark for the Wilson mile was 1:37 3-5, set last year by Observant.

Jockeys F. Slate and A. Bauman, who were unseated in the fourhorse steeplechase, suffered broken collarbones and severe bruises to add further to the opinion that the revamped steeplechase course is stiffer than the old. Slate was up on Rock Lad, while Bauman handled Black Bean. Both seemed to have a good chance of winning when their mounts came down.

The Sanford Stud Farm's Action, a 6-year-old son of Olambala-Violet Play, and held at 9 to 5, triumphed easily after the mishaps. Second was the 25-to-1 chance, National Anthem. The time of the victor was 4:20 3-5 for the two miles. Rock Lad was an odds-on favorite at 4 to 5 after opening at 8 to 5.

Fred Hopkins, well known a few years ago as the trainer of Equipoise, put over a long shot as the program began when he saddled Timepiece at 50 to 1.

Timepiece came far back to prevail by a length and a half. The showing of the Sage Stable colorbearer was totally unexpected, for he defeated a speedy field, including A. O'Connell and Founder. The last named was well backed at 4 to 1 and led in the stretch, but faltered just before the end. A. O'Connell was just up to nip him by a nose for the place.

The favorite, Corum, was just back of Founder and a nose before Secret Vote. The victor finished in the slow time of 1:08 2-5 for the five and a half furlongs.

Over a century ago, from the year 1832 to 1836, Alexis Clermont was carrying mail between Chicago and Green Bay, Wisconsin, making the 240-mile trip afoot, averaging eight miles a day.

In his 89th year, 1892, dressed in the same buckskin suit he had worn in the pioneer days, Mr. Clermont made the same trip to Chicago, walking over the same old mail route, to take part in the opening of the Chicago World's Fair.

Date Of First Vintner Put About 10,000 B.C.

Noah was not the first wine grower. Far from it, according to Rene Dage and Alban Aribaud, respectively French cenologist and wine expert, who after searching new light on the history of the grape in Egypt and elsewhere, have delivered their report.

Noah dated from somewhere between 3761 B. C. and 2105 B. C. Bacchus was real or a myth between 1500 B. C. and 1000 B. C. But the Egyptians were making wine in 7000 B. C., the investigators show, while the cavemen of the latter Stone Age days could have done it first if they knew how, and it is more than likely they did, according to the New York Herald Tribune. Thus the first wine might have dated from 10000 B. C.

The investigators found that the earliest traces of the grapevine date to the Cenozoic Era among the dicotyledone and the magnoliaceæ. Fossil prints show them with the pointed leaves of the species known in French vineyards today as American vines.

Salvaging Of Lusitania Planned By British Firm

An attempt is to be made by a British company is a salvage the Lusitania. The Argonaut Corporation. Ltd., at a cost of $75,000, has fitted out a Clyde-built boat, the Ophir, with the latest salvaging equipment. The syndicate also recently patented a diving apparatus in which work is possible at a depth of 400 feet, according to New York Herald Tribune, Previously 200 feet was regarded as the maximum to which a diver could descend.

Should the salvaging of the Lusitania prove successful the company will salvage as many as possible of the 500 wrecks to which it has the salvage rights. The first step will be the taking of films of the wreck for scientific purposes, after which the divers plan to cut through the sides with oxyacetylene jets. The ship lies in 276 feet of water about eight miles off the old head of Kinsdale.

"On profound examination and consideration, I decided today to resign from honorary membership in the Steel Helmet."

In concluding, he expressed the wish that "every front fighter, whom I believe to be the most valuable part of German manhood, become active at the place apparently most suitable to rebuild the beloved German Fatherland. I agreed in this idea with the founder members of the Steel Helmet organization, and I will continue to do so under changed conditions."

The Stahlhelm, official journal of the Steel Helmet organization, has been banned "until further notice," the government announced today."

Foreign Press Attacked

Speaking at Essen, Dr. Goebbels unleashed a violent attack on the foreign press for "trying to make out a crisis in Germany when there is nothing but a house cleaning going on here."

"They are making an elephant out of a flea," he declared. "The State is in no danger, but the small cliques which rise up against it are."

Dr. Goebbels then lashed out at Jews, terming them "the jackals of business." He said they "are always provoking trouble."

"We have looked on with the patience of Job for two years, but we will stand it no longer," he said. "In the future no mixed Jewish and Aryan marriages will be tolerated."

Claiming for the Nazi administration "complete religious tolerance," he said the State no longer would tolerate the confessional press or any Protestant, Catholic or Jewish professional organization.

"The next few weeks will show what we are going to do to them," he threatened.

Dr. Goebbels especially hit at smuggling of money abroad by members of Catholic organizations.

"If Christ came to Germany he would scourge them out of his temple," he roared.

The official Nazi press service complained that Jews were disguising their businesses as "Aryan."

"What the Jews would do to us if they had the power has been shown by Mayor La Guardia of New York," it said. "Therefore it is necessary to tear off this Aryan masks."

At Gladbeck no Jews may use public baths or sports halls or send their children to public schools. They are forbidden to acquire land, a house or other property. At Dortmund Jews have been barred from the meat markets.

Father Baumnoer of Denkingen, Wuerttenburg, faced a sentence for speaking disrespectfully of the Nazi flag and brown uniforms.

Motor trucks filled with Storm Troopers paraded the Kurfuerstendamm neighborhood. The trucks bore streamers with anti-Jewish slogans. The occupants distributed handbills advertising the anti-Semitic campaign of the Nazi leader, Julius Streicher.

The Reich broadcasting service sent a message to the world by Theodore Lewald, president of the organizing committee for the Olympic Games, in which he called upon the youth of the world to "come and see how in Adolf Hitler's Germany national pride and national strength are united with cordial comradeship and sporting fair play."

Writers Face Oustings

According to Berlin dispatches to Paris newspapers to German Government is preparing a widespread drive against indiscreet foreign correspondents.

The recent expulsion of Ernst Klein, correspondent of the Basler Nachrichten, was only a prelude to expulsion orders against a number of other correspondents already listed by Dr. Paul Joseph Goebbels, Propaganda Minister, it is stated.

The dispatches say the Reich government is determined by this means to silence correspondents who dwell upon the difficulties the Nazi regime is encountering and particularly those who have been stressing that is developing from the activities of th extremist elements within the party.

One Of Every Three Couples In US Childless

One out of every three married couples in the United States are classed as "childless" by the Census Bureau.

In 1930 the percentage of couples without children stood at 31.9, but it was now moved higher. Officials apply this estimate to "normal" families. If divorced families, or those broken by death are included, the percentage of childlessness is greater, according to the New York Times.

In the "normal" group there were 23,352,990 couples in 1930, of which 7,447,328 had no children. Families having one child numbered 5,254,863; those having two children, 4,246,459; three children, 2,650,730; four or more, 3,753,610.

City couples had fewer children that rural families and childless Negro families were more numerous than white.

Jubilee Reviews Stressed Defense As British Aim

King Measures Efficiency Of Of His Forces On Land, Sea And In Air

LONDON—Collective security and diverse systems for maintaining the peace of the world are still largely in the stage of discussion, and until they become operative as an effective safeguard, individual nations apparently are destined to place their chief reliance upon soldiers, sailors, airmen and machines at their command. This fact was brought out strikingly in the recent reviews by King George of Britain's armed forces.

No country desires arms for arms sake. The so-called glory of the battlefields has gone. But until the power of arms ceases to be a deciding factor in human affairs, there will be demand for efficiency in defense forces.

The measure of efficiency of the British Army, Airforce and Fleet was gauged by the King when he embarked upon his tour of inspection which in no small degree, because of the Jubilee celebrations this year, became something in the nature of a spectacle, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Modern Armada

In the naval review, the King's yacht, Victoria and Albert, was escorted by the Trinity House and Admiralty yachts, Patricia and Enchantress. They steamed up the line, followed by several vessels carrying official and unofficial guests.

In one of the parallel lines lay Great Britain's only postwar capital ships, the Nelson and the Rodney. Off in the distance Nelson's Victory raised its masts, while in another direction there jutted out the point of land from which Nelson sailed on his memorable voyage to Gibraltar. Up the line lay the Hood, 42,000 tons, the largest warship afloat, looking almost as fresh as the day it left the shipyard on the Clyde.

To the right the Australia, manned by sailors of the Commonwealth, took its place in the line, while farther up could be seen the sloop Indus, India's contribution to the fleet.

Famous Yachts

At the far end of the line, rocking gently in the breeze, were ships famous in international yachting history—the Shamrock, Yankee, Endeavor. The Berengaria, Homeric and other big liners took their place near Discovery II, a vessel brought into the limelight by its voyages into the Antarctic. A touch of literary interest was added with Read Admiral Dickens, a grandson of Charles Dickens, commanding the crusier Cardiff.

For miles along the shore the sands were covered with spectators who had rolled in by bus, train, and automobile, or come on foot, to see the armada.

What purpose does such a review serve? Is it to glorify the might and majesty of the British Empire, or to cast a false glamor over war? Is it to stimulate or reawaken an interest in the sea, and the ships that sail upon and under its surface? Or is it to be regarded as a feature, though a spectacular feature, of the Jubilee celebrations which have marked the completion of twenty-five years of a happy, successful and inspiring reign?

Viewed in the last-named way, the review serves as a striking illustration of Britain's sea traditions and widespread empire. But observers of the recent emphasis upon armed force, with American fleet maneuvers in the Pacific and war planes droning over every country, see disturbing signs of a return toward the prewar mentality which glorified force and contributed to the outbreak hostilities.

In the midst of the color, stirring martial music and impressive material power of a review such as the British Jubilee event, even staunch advocates of pacific means for preserving peace and settling international differences may be swept off their feet and overlook the grim subtlety of relying on 16-inch guns for national or international security.

While armed forces are clung to by nations which on paper at least have renounced war, it would appear consistent to view them as police forces and to strip them so far as possible of the traditional glamor that in the past has swept nations blindly into war. It was in this light that many British peace advocates, who 10,000,000 strong had voted only a short time before in favor of pacific means, watched the King's review of the fleet.

Quiet Army Review

Similarly with the army review held three days before at Rushmoor. It was not the whole army that went marching across the grass, but a representative selection, 10,000 men in all, showing each aspect of the British Army, the soldiers from each part of Britain, the cavalry, the infantry, the signal corps, the trucks, the tanks.

Kink George and the 50,000 spectators had come to Rushmoor to see their soldiers. It was not a great spectacle, not sensational, but dramatic. The crowd knew this. They seemed to feel themselves the guests of the King. They were impressed by the dignity of the troops and their absolute discipline, the fine precision of drilling that only men can master and that machines lack.

So the crowd did not bellow. They clapped as Queen Mary stepped to the dais from her car. They stood up in deference to their King as King George rode slowly toward his Queen, leading his soldier staff. They applauded the polish of the drilling troops. They laughed and cheered the two little mascots, the white stately soldiers goat of the Welsh regiment, in its scarlet coat, and the little antelope of the Warwickshires, led by two soldiers holding white reins. They held their breath as the tanks swept by spurting brown earth as they wheeled sharply from the arena. They cheered their King at the close, as he left Rushmoor with Queen Mary—just an hour after the review began.

Britain's Jobless Below 2 Million, Best In 5 Years

234,000 More People At Work Than In July Last Year, Survey Reveals

For the first time in five years the number of registered unemployed in Great Britain on July 22 was below 2,000,000 according to a report from London. The figure announced by the Ministry of Labor for the July count were 1,972,941, and this total is the lowest recorded since July 14, 1930, when the numbers were 1,939,866. By July 28, 1930, the aggregate had risen to 2,011,467, and before a period of real improvement came under the National Government in 1933 a peak of nearly 3,000,000 was reached. Between January, 1933, and July, 1935, the decrease in the number of registered unemployed amounted to well over 900,000.

The further fall in unemployment last month was accompanied by a new high level in the number of persons in employment. The Ministry of Labor calculated that on July 22 approximately 10,381,000 insured men, women, boys, and girls between the ages of 16 and 64 were employed in the country. This total was 20,000 more than in June and 234,000 more than in July last year.

A Progressive Rise

For the fourth successive month the figure exceeded that for any earlier date during the period of over 14 years for which comparable statistics are available. The increase in the total between January and July this year was 328,000, as compared with an increase of 269,000 in the corresponding period of 1934. Since September, 1931, it is estimated that the number of insured persons in employment has increased by 1,000,000. The increase above the lowest point reached in the summer of 1932, even if persons involved in the trade disputes in that year are included among the employed, was over 1,100,000.

Normally June is the best month for employment in the year, and it has been customary for a downward tendency to be shown in July. Between the year 1924, when there was some improvement in industry after the depression which followed the War, and 1934 the numbers in employment in July exceeded the total for June only in 1925, 1926, and 1929. In 1926 industry was recovering from the immediate effects of the general strike in May of that year; and in 1929 there was an increase in the estimated numbers insured which more than counterbalanced an increase between the two months in the numbers unemployed. Seasonal influences which might have checked the forward movement last month were outweighed by other factors, including the continuance of trade improvement.

Youth Seeking Work

The fall in unemployment was effected in spite of an increase of nearly 6,000 in the number of unemployed boys and girls aged 14 and 15 after the end of the school term in Scotland and certain other areas. This month there will be a more substantial draft of school-leavers to be absorbed. The total of 1,972,941 unemployed showed a reduction of 27,169 as compared with the number on the registers at June 24 and of 153,319 on the figures for July, 1934. Last year there was an increase of nearly 34,000 between June and July. In the six months between January and July, 1935, the numbers of unemployed on the registers in Great Britain fell by over 352,000, as compared with 263,000 in the corresponding period of 1934.

Reductions in unemployment were recorded in six out of the eight administrative divisions. Slackness in local industries was responsible for a small rise in the Midlands. A larger increase in Scotland was due chiefly to temporary causes, including the registration of some 9,500 jute workers when works were closed for trade holidays. In the London and South-Eastern areas the total of 253,587 unemployed was 15,988 less than a year ago.

British Laborites Find Increase In Radicalism

The Labor party in England will fight the coming general election on the issue of "war mongering" and unemployment.

Labor party chiefs have been exceptionally bitter over the increase in armaments in the country but they realize that any complications abroad that would threaten Britain's trade connections and sea lanes to the dominions could cut this issue from under their feet.

Unemployment is their "old reliable" issue, says the New York Times. The figure stays around 2,000,000 regardless of the advances in industrial employment under the national government. Observers who have been out through the country have returned with expressions of amazement over the radical talk heard in some districts still hard hit by economic conditions.

The shipping, coal mining, and manufacturing areas are not only too pleased with the government's policies, these observers say.

Career of Merle Oberon

Merle Oberon, who will soon be seen in Tokyo with Douglas Fairbanks is "Private Life of Don Juan," was born February 19, 1911, on Island of Tasmania. Her father died three months before her birth. He was an English army officer, and mother and children lived with sister-in-law until Merle was seven.

Then she lived with her mother at home of Lady Monteith in Bombay, India, for two years, later moved to Calcutta where they remained for ten years with Merle's uncle, her father's brother.

Her education was received in Bombay and Calcutta, finishing at Martinere College in latter city. At 16 she was introduced into "Cats"—Calcutta Amateur Theatrical Society, danced in chorus and sang in trio. At 17 she went to England with her Uncle. She did not want to return with him so he bought her a ticket for emergency use and left her there. She cashed in the ticket, and went job hunting, finally secured job as hostess, held it three months when her mother arrived.

Eventually she secured screen role, a minor part, and played obscure parts for two years, but was seen one day by Alexander Korda of London Films, who sent for her immediately.

Her first picture was "Wedding Rehearsal," followed by "Men of Tomorrow." She was cast as Anne Boleyn in "Private Life of Henry VIII" and was then given feminine leads in "Thunder in the East" and "Broken Melody."

Recent pictures are "Scarlet Pimpernel," in which she played the feminine lead opposite Leslie Howard; "The Private Life of Don Juan," with Douglas Fairbanks, "Folies Bergere," with Maurice Chevalier. All of the above were released by United Artists.

Miss Oberon is 5 feet 2 inches tall, has chestnut hair and hazel eyes, is of nervous temperament, cares little for night life, fond of reading, especially biographies. The name Merle is French for blackbird. Her full name is Estelle Merle O'Brien-Thompson.

Moscow Looks North For Sea And Air Outlet

100 Expeditions In Arctic Seek Routes For Planes And Passages For Vessels

The projected non-stop flight of a Soviet plane from Moscow to San Francisco over the North Pole, a distance of 6,200 miles, lends new interest to the rapidly increasing activities of the Soviets in the Arctic.

The relatively land-locked character of the more densely populated areas of the old Russia led the Czarist governments to seek outlets to the sea through territorial expansion. Committed for the present to the policy of remaining within their own frontiers, the Soviets must limit themselves to full exploitation of the sea outlets which they possess. Under these circumstances, their eyes turn naturally to their extensive Arctic coastline. Just as Soviet leaders have been wont to dramatize industrialization and agricultural collectivization, so they have sought to dramatize their work of "conquering" the Arctic, says Ralph W. Barnes, Moscow correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, whose article follows:

Northern Rescuers Heroes

In the winter of 1934 the Soviet freighter Chelyuskin, balked in its attempt to become the first commercial vessel to navigate the northeast passage from Leningrad to Vladivostok in one season, was crushed by ice floes and sank off the North Cape of Siberia. The rescue of survivors from the ice was effected largely by Soviet airmen who flew out from the mainland. Upon their return to Moscow, the flyers were welcomed as conquering heroes. Overnight the Chelyuskin rescues had been made into a great national event. Even games for children were developed around the exploits of the rescuers.

To indicate the increasing interest of the Kremlin in developing the Soviet North, it is sufficient to note that this summer nearly 100 Arctic expeditions of one character or another are in progress. The Arctic Institute alone is sponsoring thirty expeditions.

Aviation Big Factor

Aviation is playing a big role in exploratory work. Small air bases have been established at various points along the northern Siberian coastline, and a number of Soviet ice-breakers, engaged in exploration or observation, are carrying planes. In earlier dispatches it was noted that the Arctic Institute is planning a dirigible expedition to the north of Franz Joseph Land for next summer.

Among the current expeditions, that of the ice-breaker Sadko, which sailed from Archangel, July 6, is perhaps the most interesting. Carrying a large party of scientists and two airplanes, the Sadko will follow the coastline to the North Cape of Norway, circle Spitzergen and then proceed eastward along a zigzag course north of the 80th parallel. The principal object of the expedition is to determine the feasibility of a commercial route across the Arctic between 80th and 85th parallels.

Undaunted by the disaster to the Chelyuskin, the Soviets are proceeding vigorously with their program of developing a trade route along the so-called northeast passage. This year, for the first time, several Soviet ships are attempting a passage in either direction, from Vladivostok and from the northern ports of European Russia. Meanwhile, three Soviet ice-breakers, the Krassin, the Litke and the Yermak, are scheduled to conduct ice observations at various points along the passage.

Soviet meteorological stations have been established at many points on the islands north of the Siberian coast line, and scientific parties are working here and there on these insular possessions.

The two important controlling organizations in the active Arctic field are the Arctic Institute, headed by Professor Rudolph Samoilovich, and the so-called Northern Sea Routes, directed by Professor Otto Schmidt, who headed the scientific party aboard the ill-fated Chelyuskin.

The forthcoming polar flight is sponsored by the Northern Sea Routes. Both the Institute and the Northern Sea Routes have taken active interest in examining the possibilities of air transport in the Arctic.

So far there is no general agreement as to what route will prove most feasible from economic and technical viewpoints. The projected flight over the pole, if successful, undoubtedly will in this field, just as Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh's trans-Atlantic flight in 1927, stimulate civil aviation.

Peasants In Turkey Exchange Villages With The Bulgarians

The last remaining Bulgarian village in Eastern Thrace, that part of Turkey still remaining in Europe, has just moved, bag and baggage, into Bulgaria. In exchange, the inhabitants of one of the many Turkish villages in Bulgaria moved bag and baggage into Thrace.

Before the Balkan War of 1912, there were more than 100,000 Bulgarians in Thrace, but as a result of Bulgaria's double defeat, practically all of them were chased out, says the Christian Science Monitor. They fled into Bulgaria and settled, where they could, as refugees. One lone village with 80 houses remained.

The peasants there had enough land and materially got along as well as they had been doing for a couple of thousand years, but they found themselves faced with a very difficult problem of a very special nature. Whom were the young folks to marry? This was a very tiny Bulgarian island in a Turkish sea. Everybody gradually became related to everybody else. All the girls in town were the cousins of all the boys.

According to the orthodox church, cousins cannot marry one another. So the boys drifted into Bulgaria to seek brides and most of them never came back. The one lone Bulgarian village in Thrace was in danger of becoming a feminine settlement.

So they all decided to move to Bulgaria. And they told the Turkish Government of their wish. The Turkish Government told the Bulgarian Government, which paged the 700 Turkish villages in Bulgaria, asking who wanted to go to Turkey. One village with about 80 families spoke up and the swap was arranged.

Turks went into Bulgarian houses, Bulgarians into Turkish houses, but they seem to be getting along all right.

World's Industrial Activity Due Mainly To War Preparations

Preparation for war rather than industrial recovery leading to permanent peacetime improvement is, it would appear, the main stimulus behind the present world-wide increased industrial activity from the depths of the depression.

That, at any rate, is the somewhat ominous conclusion to be drawn from a survey of industrial activity by industries in almost every important country in the world made by the League of Nations, and published in its latest Statistical Year Book, says Frances William, City Editor of The Daily Herald, London.

In country after country the highest level of activity is shown in the iron and steel, metallurgical and chemical industries, which are more closely associated than any others with armament developments, and it is these industries also which have in most cases made the most rapid and extensive recovery from the depths of the depression.

The big recovery shown in the iron and steel and metallurgical industries in the United Kingdom has been duplicated in Japan, Germany, Belgium, Norway and France, while the chemical industries of Czechoslovakia and Sweden, the mining industries of Canada, Norway and other countries have expanded at remarkable speed.

The same evidence is provided by detailed indices of employment, the greatest recovery in employment being, in a large number of cases, in industries providing raw materials for armaments.

The recovery from the depression has thus, it seems highly probable, been due to a large extent not so much to a real improvement in international industrial conditions as to increased expenditure on war preparations.

Jews Demanding More Immigration Of Palestine Govt.

Power For Increased Number Asked By President Of Jewish Agency

Powers for increased immigration are demanded from the Palestine Government by the Jewish Agency. A letter to this effect was sent recently by Nahum Sokolow, president of the agency, to Sir Arthur Wauchope, High Commissioner for Palestine, with the agency's annual report to be transmitted to the League of Nations. This letter has become a yearly practice since 1924 when the Permanent Mandates Commission first began to examine Mandatories' reports.

Mr. Sokolow, while noting the satisfactory progress made in Palestine since the 1933 memorandum to the League, ascribes the concentration of the Jews in the towns to the labor shortage which, it is claimed, is due in turn to the underestimation by the Government of the country's capacity to absorb new immigrants, according to the Christian Science Monitor. While immigration increased substantially over preceding years, it is still inadequate, according to the agency, to meet the growing needs of the country.

Effect of Labor Shortage

The labor shortage, which has been felt the last three years, it is pointed out by the Jews, has had the effect of dislocating the labor market, checking economic enterprise, and causing Jewish labor to flock to urban occupations at the expense of agriculture, because of the discrepancy in wage levels.

Mr. Sokolow urges the Government to take effective measures to arrest the process of an unlawful immigration from Palestine's neighboring countries—Trans Jordan, Syria and Egypt. The present period of progress for the Arab population of Palestine, he contends, practically wiping out unemployment and raising the standards of life, has led to the influx of a large number of indigent inhabitants from across Palestine's borders, who come here and settle with their families, without complying with immigration restrictions to which the Jews are subjected.

"It is difficult," Mr. Sokolow says, "to reconcile with the terms of the Mandate the prevailing condition of affairs under which non-Jewish immigrants from neighboring countries are allowed to infiltrate relatively unchecked, while Jewish immigrants are not admitted to the full extend of the country's absorptive capacity."

Seek Better Pay

The Government, Mr. Sokolow maintains, when fixing the immigration quota should take into account the number of Jews who should be employed in Government public works. Another result of the labor shortage and the consequent rise in wages, is that Jews have been resigning from the police force and the railways to seek more remunerative private employment.

It is the Government's duty, he urges, to avoid this by making the rate of pay in these two services conform in some measure to the prevailing conditions in the labor market.

The Jewish Agency's report to the League states the Jewish population in Palestine has increased by 65,000 the last year and that 62,114 dunams (15,523 acres) of land were acquired at a cost of £1,647,836. There are 160 Jewish settlements with an area of 1,300,000 dunams and a population of 70,000. The total Jewish population is put at 350,000. One hundred and seventy new industrial enterprises were started in the year under review with an investment of £10,000,000.

AF Of L To Fight Boring By Reds

Parley To Deal With Defiance Of Workers In Admitting Communist Group

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor was to begin holding its quarterly meeting at Atlantic City on August 5 in order to complete the report which it was to submit to the annual convention scheduled for Oct. 7.

Of important domestic interest was the consideration of the Communist tactics of "boring from within," with special reference to the defiance of the federation by the International Union of Fur Workers, which has permitted the opposing Communist union to affiliate with the international union.

Recent pronouncements from the Third International which propose rapid infiltration of the federation unions by the Communist-controlled labor organizations was to be on the agenda, according to Louis Stark in the New York Times.

The article, dated August 4, continues:

It is expected that the council will deal "vigorously and most directly" with the Communist developments in the fur workers' union, according to an announcement today.

President William Green of the A. F. of L. will place before the council the plans for a convention of automobile workers' unions to be held in Detroit on Aug. 26. At the meeting in Detroit all the local unions affiliated directly to the federation will be formed into a separate international union with its own charter, its own officers and its own autonomy. Automobile workers will no longer be guided directly by the federation, but will transact their own affairs through their own international organization.

The movement for the issuance of a charter by the federation to the automobile workers, consolidating them into one international union, has been under way for more than a year. In June, 1934, at a meeting of the automobile unions in Detroit the delegates urged Mr. Green to grant them a charter on a national or international (the latter would include workers in Canada) basis. At that time Mr. Green said the time was not yet at hand for such a change, but he promised that a charter for a single organization would be granted at the proper time.

At the annual convention of the A. F. of L. in San Francisco last October a resolution was adopted providing that international union charters be granted to the workers in the automobile, cement and aluminum industries. The first of these charters will be granted to the automobile workers. It is understood that under this charter skilled workers in the automobile industry, such as maintenance men, tool and dye makers, machinists, electrical workers and stationary firemen, will be permitted to form separate organizations of their own crafts.

In essence the charter will be for an international union of production workers rather than a wholly industrial union comprising all employes "in and about the automobile manufacturing plants."

Scheduled for the council meeting, which will last about ten days, are several jurisdictional disputes. The report of the council to the forthcoming convention of the federation will not be made public until the convention meets in October.

The council meeting also will consider the relation of the United States to the threatened war between Ethiopia and Italy.

Nature's Defenses Protect Ethiopia In Event Of War

The following is an article written on Ethiopia for the New York Times by Marcelle Prat, French woman journalist.

At Addi Ugri, close to the Ethiopian frontier, the idea came to me that I should persist in my efforts to persuade the authorities to let me penetrate Ethiopia.

"Adowa, the capital of Tigre," I was told, "is tucked away in mountains almost inaccessible. Even mules have all they can do to make the track. Of course, it would be interesting for you to see Ras Seyoum, the ruler of the district, but you will be refused permission to go into Tigre now."

"What do you know about Ras Seyoum?" I asked.

"Nothing. He is wrapped in the greatest of mystery. His palace is out of reach. From Addis Ababa it takes a month's journey to reach him by mule, and our side of the frontier is closed. So, you see, it is not often that he has visitors. However, it is on his troops that victory or the utter defeat of Ethiopia depends."

Prince Seyoum is the grandson of that formidable Yohannes who, it is said, drew his guns and ammunition from the English, succeeded in reducing all his rivals and took the title of Negus Negusti (King of Kings). Crowned at Axum, the holy city, he took the name Yohannes in 1897. His reign was one long series of internal wars.

Killed in Fighting Dervishes

Menelik King of Shoa, was his great rival, and Menelik was supported by the Italians, whose interest it was to sow discord in Ethiopia. Ultimately Yohannes was killed in fighting the dervishes, and only his untimely death enabled Menelik to assume power. It was Menelik's soldiers who defeated the Italians at Adowa in 1895.

Chance, or fate, played suddenly into my hands, and I was able to cross the frontier into Ethiopia. One morning a gentleman met me at my hotel and told me to follow. He informed me that General Emilio de Bono (Italian High Commissioner in Africa) would no longer oppose my journey.

The Ethiopian consul said his wife would travel with me, and the following morning she came for me.

We were to travel by car as far as the River Maob. From that point we should travel with the caravan sent by the Prince Seyoum.

Mine was a peculiar sensation when at last we met the caravan. As I descended from the car, I found myself faced by a rampart of blacks with thick, stiff hair, who welcomed us by bowing till their foreheads touched the ground.

I was allotted a caparisoned white mule, a saddle ornamented with gold and beads, a collar of engraved silver, little silver bells. This odd beast was almost entirely wrapped in cloth.

Accompanied by our escort, we went forward to the land of the King of Kings. Our road wound along, now ascending, now descending. Our escort marched alongside, giants in bronze, with thick shoulders. They were chattering incessantly in their own tongue.

Heat Compelled a Halt

Our caravan moved like a caterpillar across the mountains. The kingdom of the King of Kings unfolded itself reluctantly. The heat finally compelled a halt.

"We will stop at the first village," said the consul's wife.

A few straw shelters, a carpet stretched under a tree—that was our halting place; and there we were to stay until the sun moved down toward the horizon.

We pressed on by moonlight, clamped to our mules. I was ready to cry "Enough," but I had to hold on.

In the light of the moon a peak, bristling with lances, shone. The polished steel of the arms caught the beams and threw them back. A hundred soldiers waited for us above. My pulse quickened.

In the gorges hyenas yowled. A war-song came from the mountain top. Those were extraordinary minutes during which we traveled toward a human barricade, with lances catching the moonlight. Not a man among them moved.

The Consul's wife, preceded by twenty of our men with fixed bayonets, went ahead. I followed. She began the crossing of a platform similar to a drawbridge. When she pulled up her mule, the soldiers halted and we waited in silence.

From the summit, a mounted soldier approached at the gallop, lance in hand. In a twinkling he was there, the chief man of the district, his cape flowing in the wind. The warrior threw himself to earth before us, paid his respects and gave us clear passage. Now our caravan followed him, and slowly we defiled between two ranks of soldiers.

Eats the National Bread

Two chairs were brought for us. On a straw table they served a meal, chicken, eggs, rice and pimiento sauce. Everything was brought in on a sort of soft, elastic paste, a dirty gray in color, which looked like cloth. But those great pancakes were the national bread, the ingera. After eating we went into a tent, the Consul's wife and I, to sleep.

At 3 o'clock in the morning we were up. Slowly the sun rose behind the mountains. Beyond those mountains—was there an army eager to be on the move? I arose abruptly, and went after a little information.

"Where are we now?"

"This is a strategical point. The first line of defense of the Province."

I look around. There was no telegraph post, or telephone.

"How do you send news to the army?"

"Quite easily. We light beacons, and each column of smoke that rises writes its message in the sky. We have a complete code. Our people will read the declaration of war in the sky!"

Vainly I searched for gun emplacements, for barricades, ramparts, or fortress. Nothing of that sort could be seen.

In this country war meant an entirely different thing from our conception of it.

As we journeyed into the Province of Tigre—that spur of Ethiopia which is actually the key to the kingdom of the King of Kings—the land formed a formidable barrier to our progress, a barrier which increased as we approached Adowa. The surface of the earth was rougher, the mountains sharper, the chasms steeper.

Land Protected by Nature

It seemed as though the land of the King of Kings was entrenched behind frontiers of impenetrable vegetation; thick bush and briars, more plentiful than the most extravagant use of barbed wire on the Hindenburg Line, combined with giant thorns to protect the country.

I wondered how artillery could ever be carried up those perpendicular sides of the ravines or along the beds of the torrents which were thick with massive rocks. How could they negotiate the trees and the sand?

For every gun that may be emplaced in this region it will be necessary to clear the earth first, then to work with pick and explosive to tear mountains apart, to reduce the massive walls of a natural fortress.

A detachment of soldiers came to meet us.

"They are the men of Ras Seyoum!" cried the consul's wife.

There were more than 200 enormouse fellows in baggy pantaloons, with bare heads and bare feet. They marched in formation, with cartridge belts around their waists, swords that fell to their heels, guns on their shoulders.

From the four cardinal points the Chafs descended the mountains, until our escort totaled more than 300 warriors of Tigre.

It was almost noon. We were at the door of Adowa, to the tinkling of harness-bells, the clink of lances and swords ornamented with silver and gold.

Enveloped in wraps almost to their necks, mettlesome mules carried strange cavaliers in their purple saddles, soldiers with tangled hair and black faces, dressed like matadors.

From the hillsides nearby music burst on the air, and it was to that strange melody that we crossed the first threshold of Adowa.

A steep, pebbly street rose before us. Adowa consists of long, winding corridors, which lead to the palace of Ras Seyoum.

Billeted in Chief's House

At the word of command, our caravan and escort passed through a ruined gateway and came to a halt. We climbed a broken staircase and took our place behind a sort of counter that was covered with plush. We were kept waiting for a time that seemed interminable. It seemed as though Ras Seyoum had forgotten all about us.

Then we were informed that the house to which we had been brought, and which was to be our lodging, belonged to a great chieftain.

I looked around. There was no bed—only a little straw on the floor and a few carpets hung on the walls.

"We are really expected to live here?"

"Yes, but don't worry; they will bring up your camp-bed."

There was no furniture, no water, not even a basin. The windows were simply loopholes cut in the walls. That night, since our servants would sleep at our feet, four or five people would sleep in the room.

Machinery had not changed this country. The ways of life were those of the time of Solomon. The thought of God could still rouse the crowds to fanaticism, so that, when one spoke of war, they replied: "The Ethiopian extends his hand toward God and has need of none other!"

Who, without melancholy, could visualize this strange and somewhat beautiful survival being crushed by artillery?

Very carefully, as though it were only part of my casual inspection of the city, I followed a little investigation on the point of arms and preparation. I saw perhaps a thousand or twelve hundred rifles, all of the same make. They were relics of Adowa, bearing the name St. Etienne, as well as a few Belgian and German makes.

Actually, the great influx of modern arms of which so much had been said in the newspapers to my knowledge had not penetrated to the city.

Medieval Franklin To Be Paid Tribute By French Printers

Guillaume Fichet, fifteenth-century "Benjamin Franklin of France," is to be honored soon by the erection of a mounment in his native village of Petit Bornand, near Chamonix, France.

The printer's guilds of France are behind this movement to memorialize Fichet, who is generally recognized as the first great French printer, says the Christian Science Monitor. Although experts differ on the point, Fichet is credited by most authorities with having printed, in 1470, the first book to come off the press in France. More than a crattsman, however, he earned fame as an author, an educator, a Rector of the Sorbonne, and an Ambassador.

Unlike Franklin, however, Fichet was not an inventor. In fact he was one of the first to proclaim Gutenberg as the discoverer "of the art of printing with movable characters." Indeed, a letter dated 1472 A. D., written in Latin, frankly proclaims "Bone Montanus"—a Latinized way of saying Gutenberg—as the pioneer of printing; and this historic document, signed by a Frenchman, is often used to support the German's claim to his invention.

Fichet's great merit was to have been one of the first to recognize the value of Gutenberg's invention, to introduce it into France, and to popularize it in the short space of three years. The first French print shop, was believed to have been set up in a classroom of the Sorbonne; and from the rudimentary press came the book, claimed by Fichet's followers to be the first ever to be printed in France. It was a collection of letters by Gasparin de Pergamo, and was dated 1470. The second volume, dated the same year, was a textbook in rhetoric composed by Fichet himself. He was aided in his printing by three Germans who had learned their trade, in part, under Gutenberg himself.

When the first volume came off the Sorbonne presses, Fichet celebrated by making a speech in which Paris, for the first time, is described as "La Ville Lumiere"—the city of Lights—but the orator was thinking of the light of Science and Art. Within two years, print shops had been established in Angers, Caen, Lyons, Metz, Troyes, Toulouse, Albi, Dijon and Macon; and within a decade, there were 60 print shops in Paris alone. Fichet was particularly interested in printing because it "will exterminate that literary plague—the indefinite variation of texts by copyists."

One of his successors, not as a printer, but as a rector of the Sorbonne, Dr. Sebastien Charlety, heads the committee sponsoring the Fichet monument.

of six hours as compared with the present quickest possible rail connections between the two cities, which is 18 hours 30 minutes. In other words the "Asia" will cover the distance between Hsinking in three hours fifty-eight minutes while the present train covers it in seven hours and thirty minutes.

The rest of the time saved accrues from the elimination of waiting time at Hsinking for changing trains. And with respect to goods traffic, the elimination of transhipment at Harbin and the time saved will afford immeasuable benefit to shippers and public by lessening of damages due to transhipment and transporting perishable goods, such as, fish, fruits, etc, more rapidly for the consumption of people in the North who are remote from such supplies.

Thus, it could be easily imagined to what extent the consummation of this project will contribute to the development of social, economic and industrial life of the new State, locally as well as with Japan by providing closer and quicker connections through Dairen, Antung or Tumen.

Now the old policy of forced assimilation seems to be giving way to another, and the preservation of racial individuality is being extolled as the way toward harmony, stability and a rich cultural life.

Inventors Seek End To Abuses Of Patent Pools

Drive For Revision Of Law Is Launched At Convention In Chicago

A move to eliminate the abuses of patent pools and revise the present patent laws was urged in Chicago, Illinois, by Dr. Warren M. Persons, former professor of economics at Harvard University and now consulting economist for the American Economic Foundation.

A drive against these abuses and the perversion of the purpose of the law is being launched by the foundation which was organized early this year, according to Percival J. White, director. The object of the new foundation is to fight the abuses arising out of patent pools, he told the National Inventors' Congress meeting in the Windy City.

The correction sought is far-reaching, going beyond the mere subject of patents and upholding a man's right to private initiative and enterprise, Mr. White said, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Source of Abuses

The present difficulty, as described by Dr. Persons, arises out of the movement for larger business units in industry and because of the increased number of inventions. Very few single inventions can now stand alone. Still fewer patents afford exclusive rights to revolutionary processes or products. Most of the significant patents today, he said, are on improvements of inventions.

"The co-operative use of patents is inevitable," continued Dr. Persons, "and there are many companies which have gathered patents together for the output of their product which have been beneficial. But the abuse comes when the combination of patents goes beyond the scope of the patented article and when a firm can force contractors to take all of their articles whether patented or not patented. This means that the inventor of similar items has little chance."

Although Dr. Persons was not at liberty to give out names of firms, he said that the record of the abuses of patent pools is convincing. Co-operative control over numerous patents, each by itself relatively unimportant, can give that power over price which control of a revolutionary basic patent yields its individual owner under the law, he pointed out.

Power to Fix Prices

"The power of fix prices is the feature of positive attractiveness which patent co-operation holds out to the patent pool," continued the economist. "This power is achieved by combining a multiplicity of patents, charging such royalties as will tend to eliminate efficient competitors, introducing contract terms which will subjugate licensees, and avoiding legal decisions on the validity of patents or practices alleged to be in restraint of trade."

Inventors were urged by Dr. Persons to lend their support to the drive sponsored by the American Economic Foundation to end the perversion of patent law by patent pools which defeat the stated purposes of the law.

"These abuses should be eliminated," concluded Dr. Persons. "Today neither consumers nor inventors can hope for relief until an aroused and informed public opinion demands necessary changes in the present patent laws. Because neither the Sherman nor the Clayton act is being enforced, patent pools exert pressure and act to raise prices without in any way being subject to corrective control at the present time.

"Other abuses resulting from the ownership of large numbers of related patents by one group result not only in unfair treatment to inventors who find that there is no open competition for purchase of their devices but also result in higher prices totaling millions of dollars annually to the consuming can the interest of the public and inventors be adequately protected."

Patents Catalogue

It was proposed at the Congress that some of the $4,880,000,000 at the disposal of the President be used for making a general catalogue of the patents pending so that the layman would know where he is in the sea of patents.

Refrigeration was another topic brought before the Inventors' Congress. A new type of electric refrigerator which carries a dual temperature was described by George H. Glassman. When the cook opens the new refrigerator door, she is faced with another door, somewhat recessed and holding on its racks oranges, fruit juice, lettuce and all of the things which need less cold. By touching a button this inner door swings out revealing the inside compartment which is about seven degrees colder than the outside. Here meat and other food needing more refrigeration are kept.

"No more frozen lettuce or ice-topped milk," Mr. Glassmon pointed out as one of the advantages. "Besides, the housewife no longer has to move milk bottles and butter to get hold of that jar of cream. It is right at her fingertips."

The Wrong Way

The Boston Herald

It may be that some changes are desirable. It is possible that the Constitution should be amended. But there is a proper method of making changes and an improper. The proper one is to hold a constitutional convention or to submit amendments in the method with which we are so familiar. The indefensible method is to inflame the public, to use the Supreme Court as a tool, to violate the Constitution deliberately and give the New Deal such momentum that it cannot be checked. But we are still living under the Constitution. Until it is amended in the honorable way, the President is clearly under the obligation to carry out his oath of office and to protect and defend the Constitution.

'Flivver' Airplane Reaches US Capital

Ship Is One Of Several Ships Being Tested To Sell Under $1,000

A sample plane the like of which officials hope thousands of Americans soon may be able to buy cheaply and fly safely landed in Washington on August 12 after a 2,655-mile trip from the Pacific Coast.

On hand were Secretary Roper and Eugene L. Vidal, Director of Air Commerce, for whom the plane was constructed.

The success of the experiment was marred somewhat when part of the ship's landing gear, connecting one of the three wheels with the body of the machine, gave way as the pilot attempted to stop the ship in its tracks at the airport, according to the New York Times. The break merely caused the plane to spin in a sharp circle before it came to a complete stop.

Tailless, its propellor behind instead of in front, the plane was flown from Santa Monica, Calif., in thirty-one hours' flying time, although John H. Geisse, chief of the Commerce Department's aviation development section, and the ship's pilot, took eleven days for caution's sake.

An old-time test pilot, Waldo Deane Waterman, developed the plane in California. It is said to be able to land at forty miles an hour and to stop in thirty feet.

The craft is a two-passenger monoplane whose tailless feature gives it a bat-like appearance in flight. It is powered by a 4-cylinder 95-horsepower aviation engine. Control surfaces are at the trailing edges and tips of the wings.

Cruising speed is ninety miles an hour. Mr. Geisse averaged eighty-six across the country. He got from thirteen to fourteen miles from a galion of gasoline and found a ceiling of more than 12,000 feet.

The plane is one of several being tested by the Commerce Department in experiments to help the aviation industry produce a plane to sell for less than $1,000 and handle safely by the average man.

As mass production made automobiles cheap and plentiful, so do officials hope a great new industry may be created on the basis of a cheap plane. Mr. Vidal said he looked for large scale production within five years.

The landing gear accident today, officials contended, only served to prove the plane's safety, since a similar accident with an ordinary plane might have meant disaster.

"It is practically impossible," Mr. Geisse said, "to get into trouble on landing except by actually running into an obstacle."

He added that the plane could not be "stalled or spun, by any normal or reasonably abnormal use or abuse of the controls."

"In California," he said, "we tried for two weeks to put this ship into a spin and couldn't."

"How does it fly?" Secretary Roper asked.

"It flies itself," Mr. Geisses replied.

Instead of flying togs, the pilot was wearing a linen suit and Panama hat and looked as though he were a business man on his way to his office.

Officials stressed the ship's experimental character. Tests are planned with an automobile engine. Other test planes have been flown safely with such an engine.

Use of an automobile engine would reduce the cost of this or other similar planes to a few hundred dollars if made on a mass production basis, it was said.

A new type of material for wings also may be adopted and a metal propeller is to be used soon.

Orville Jorgens Wins a Starting Berth With Phils

Baker Field Made To Order For Long Hitters, Especially Left-Handers

Christian Science Monitor

Baker Field in Philadelphia is one baseball park where pitchers do not like to pitch—at least a majority of them don't. The reason is its size. From home plate to the right field fence the distance is 280 feet 6 inches. From home to center field it is 408 feet, and to the left field barrier 341 feet. Baker Field is the home grounds of the National League Phillies, managed by Jimmy Wilson.

Wilson, of course, is attempting to build up a winning club, and his biggest problem is in the pitching department. Baker Field is made to order for long hitters, especially left-handers. Singles and doubles rattled off the outfield fences that would be routine fly balls in almost any other park in the country. In the past, the Phillies have scored many victories by out-slugging rival batsmen, but in a majority of cases the home club pitchers fell down under the strain before the rival boxmen.

Pitchers Work Overtime

Short fences are hard on pitchers. The Phils play 77 games each season under such conditions. Someone may say that it is as fair for one club as another; but this is not entirely true. Any team, playing at Baker Field, is forced to use a flock of pitchers in the course of a four or five-game series. When the home club is going through the motions of a long home stand, the pitching staff is worked overtime. The staff of the visiting club is nearly always in better condition than the Phillie staff.

For this reason, a young pitcher who is trying to make the big league grade with the Phillies, is getting a severe test. If a man can win consistently at Baker Field, he certainly could pile up victories under almost any other conditions. In his efforts to build up a young pitching staff, Jimmy Wilson reached out late last season and brought in a number of promising youngsters from the minors. Among those caught in the Philadelphia dragnet was Orville Jorgens, a big right-hander who wore the uniform of the Galveston club in the Texas League. While his record was not as impressive as might be expected to justify a major league trial, young Jorgens had the size and strength to make him a great prospect.

Jorgens comes from a baseball family, as his brother, Arndt, is second-string catcher for the New York Yankees in the American League. Orville first broke into organized baseball with the Oklamoha City team in the spring of 1929, but was released to Davenport, where his fine work won a promotion to the Montreal Internationals. In 1930 he was farmed to Springfield, Mass., and later to Clarksburg and Binghamton. The following season he was with Binghamton, Montreal, York and Harrisburg. In 1932 he pitched for Harrisburg, Montreal and Omaha. During the seasons of 1933 and '34, he toiled for Galveston.

In the Texas League last season, Jorgens won 14 games and lost nine. His chief trouble was wildness, as is shown by the 93 bases on ball he issued in 211 innings, added to nine wild pitches. However, his earned run average was 3.24, which was fair.

Trouble Is Wildness

Jorgens' trouble is still wildness. To date this season, he has won seven games and dropped nine for the Phils, a good record considering the position his team holds in the National League standing and also considering the support any Phillie pitcher receives in Baker Field. Yesterday, Orville pitched his best game of the year, limiting the Boston Braves to three hits and winning by 9 to 1. Only two Braves reached third base. One of them was Rupert Thompson, Boston outfielder, who hit a home run in the ninth inning. Two of Boston's hits were singles.

Jorgens apparently has clinched a starting berth with the Phillies. Certainly he proved this yesterday. Over the nine-inning stretch, he walked only two batters and neither of these passes made any difference. Wilson said earlier in the season that when young Orville reached the point where he could control that fast ball, he would become a great pitcher.

Fortunate

An exiled monarch, being invited to a festivity, began chatting to another guest.

Soon, the other man, a hotel proprietor, confided that there was not much doing in his line of business at the moment.

"Nor in mine" said the former king. "And might I ask what is your line?"

'Oh I keep the 'Crown and Sceptre'" was the reply.

'You're lucky," sighed the other. "I couldn't keep mine."—Ottawa Evening Citizen.

Social Security Bill Is Adopted By US Congress

was in material provisions practically the same as the measure presented to the House by its Ways and Means Committee. It was a composite of ideas worked out by the President, Secretary Perkins, Senator Harrison, Senator Wagner, Representative Lewis and the Social Security Committee, appointed last year by Mr. Roosevelt.

The bill is an omnibus measure, including provision for immediate application and others designed more for future abatement of the "major hazards" of our complex economic life. The provisions which take immediate effect are comparatively simple, and intended in the main to assist the State in caring for dependent unemployables, such as the indigent aged, the blind, the physically disabled mothers and destitute or neglected children.

The more complicated provisions deal with unemployment insurance and old-age pensions, contributed by the employer or by the employer in conjunction with the employe, under the supervision of the Federal Social Security Board, an independent agency set up by the bill to administer all of its provisions. Secretary Perkins had desired that this board be in her department.

The immediate outlay authorized by the bill for the support of the various activities is about $95,000,000. These expenditures are chiefly for the immediate benefits. The long-range features, such as old-age pensions and unemployment insurance, are self-financing except for a small part contributed by the Federal Government for administrative expenses.

Two Homers Help Giants Top Braves At Polo Grounds

Ott Drives No. 24 And Moore No. 14 As Terrymen Win, 4-1, In Opener Of Series

By JOHN DREBINGER

N. Y. Times

NEW YORK, Aug. 3.—Having succeeded in riding out a number of twisters of tropical proportions which for a time threatened to blast them loose from their moorings on top of the National League, the Giants came upon a haven of sunshine yesterday as the Braves hove into the Polo Grounds.

True, there does not appear to be a great deal of sunshine about the forlorn Braves these days. They seem to be for the moment without a president, and yesterday they were lacking in a number of other things, including a pitcher who could keep Bill Terry's men from clicking less than an even dozen hits.

At that, the Giants acted very humanely in the matter, due perhaps to the fact that almost half of the crowd of 5,000 was comprised of women, this also being ladies' day.

Hits Homer Inside Park

Mel Ott modestly prodded his twenty-fourth homer of the campaign into the upper right tier, Joe Moore gave the boys and girls a thrill as he outraced his fourteenth circuit blow of the year inside the arena, and the rest of it was more or less perfunctory as the Terrymen merrily galloped off with the opening clash of the four-game series, 4 to 1.

The result, coupled with the setback of the second-place Cubs by the Reds, enabled the Giants to increase their lead in the pennant race to two full games.

However, there was one discordant note struck in an otherwise pleasant but intensely humid afternoon. Clydell Casteman, called Slick, making his second start since recovering from a broken bone in his pitching hand, was unable to go further than a fraction above five innings.

Entering the sixth with a lead of 3—0, Castleman allowed Urbanski to single, walked Jordan and then pitched two balls to Thompson. He seemed to be laboring with a sore arm, and Manager Terry swiftly removed him for Allyn Stout.

Urbanski Comes Home

The latter forthwith did a first-class job, for though he was not quite able prevent Wally Berger from hitting a long fly that enabled Urbanski to score from third, he gave the Braves only a single the rest of the way. And besides, nobody was heartless enough to begrudge the Braves that one tally, even if it did spoil a shutout.

Ott's circuit smash off Bob Smith sent the Giants away winging in the second, and in the third they picked up another run on Joe Moore's double and a slashing single through the box by Dick Bartell, who, with this blow, appeared to serve notice his recent batting slump has practically been exterminated. Later Dick got another hit, though it did not figure in any scoring.

In the fifth, Moore smashed a terrific drive clear out to the Giant bullpen in right center and outraced four frantic relays to the plate.

An inning later, Terry and Ott decided this was too strenuous a piece of business for such a hot day and so halved the work for the Giants' final tally. Colonel Bill whisked a double down the right-field foul line and spun his aging and aching legs homeward when Master Melvin did the same thing.

Despite the fact that he was unable to go the distance, Castleman received credit for the victory, thus hanging up his tenth triumph, against which are written only two defeats.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Wonder Horse

The most remarkable trotting horse that ever lived was Goldsmith Maid, born in May 1857. She was a farm animal until the age of 6, and raced but once between the ages of 6 and 8. Her best record was 2.14 made at Boston in 1874. She started in 123 races, winning 97, and being unplaced only twice. She ran her most exciting race in Milwaukee in July 1876, when she was more than 19 years old. In traveling she covered a distance of 130,000 miles on wheels, and earned a total of $364,200, the world's record, in an age when purses were comparatively insignificant. She was still a champion at 20, won the last race she ran, and died as a result of a cold in September 1885. A monument was erected over her grave in Trenton, N. J.

Students' Opposition To Calles Is Surprise

APRA, supplied a platform that has been partially adopted by all student organizations. This platform called for the expropriation of estates, eight-hour work days, minimum wage laws, equal civil and political rights for men and women, restriction of child labor, separation of the church and state, and the incorporation of the Indians into the life of the nation. One may justly inquire why the Peruvian and other governments opposed such a program.

Truthfully, they have not opposed it in toto. The idea for the restriction of land, separation of the church and state, and suggestions having little to do with governmental affairs have been generally accepted. The reformation of politics, however, has been another matter. The universities are usually state-controlled and financed by the governments, and students have been expected rigidly to support officials who supply the funds. Objections have led to use of troops and bloodshed.

The demonstration in Mexico City against former President Calles may seemingly be linked with students communistically inclined. If, as is commonly stated, Cardenas, through his support of labor elements, is endeavoring to plunge the nation into a second Soviet Russia, the above idea is about as good as any. On the other hand, if the Mexican President has determined merely to disassociate himself with cabinet members aligned with Calles, the demonstration and the break between him and the former "iron man" might be charged to the usual desire for political control. So little really is known about what is going on behind the scenes that anything written is purely speculative.

Treasure-Hunt To Locate Gold

$4,500,000 Said To Have Been Carried On Ship Sunk In River Off N.Y.

Ever since that first couple, consumed with overwhelming curiosity in a garden, stole the forbidden fruit of a tree, the desire to seek and explore has occupied a corner of the hearts of all men. When that desire is overwhelming the Drakes, Magellans, and Columbuses come to the fore.

Sometimes the urge leads to the discovery of new stars and planets. Without those born with the explorer's soul, science would be at a standstill; medicine scarcely would exist; surgery would be unknown; mankind would be little more than kindred to the ape.

Today, as ever, men are seeking hidden goals in various fields. Some seek only knowledge; some want fame; others are driven by the most popular fascination of all: the search for hidden treasure, or gold.

Within a stone's throw of the skyscrapers of Manhattan, a full-fledged treasure-hunt is under way, according to the Literary Digest, whose article follows: Directed by Simon Lake, submarine constructor, an attempt is being made to locate the British frigate, Hussar, which sank in the East River near 132d Street in 1780, with a reputed two and one-half to four and one-half million dollars.

The treasure, allegedly in gold, is said to have been consigned to Army and Navy paymasters of forces engaged in warfare against George Washington's men.

The Hussar lies under seventy feet of water, and ten feet of silt. To locate her accurately is no easy task, but Mr. Lake believes he has succeeded. Discovery of the ship is, however, only half the battle.

The treacherous and swift currents of Hell Gate, in the immediate vicinity, make it virtually impossible to work from a surface-tender. Mr. Lake is planning to use his baby submarine, Explorer, and a hinged steel tube which he calls a "vacuum-cleaner."

Inventor's Quest

Mr. Lake with a true inventor's heart, is not interested so much in discovering the treasure aboard the Hussar. He is not sure it even exists. He is more concerned with proving the worth of his salvage-submarine, and his "vacuum-tube."

His whole life has been devoted to inventing and building undersea craft. At ten, in Pleasantville, New Jersey, following a fascinated reading of Jules Verne's "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," he began his career as a submarine-builder when, on the Toms River, he tried to operate an overturned rowboat as a submarine. Fortunately for him a fisherman was near-by.

It was not, however, until he was twenty-eight that he had anything tangible to show for his dreams. It was then, at Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, that he launched his first real submarine, a crude, wooden contraption, smeared with tar, and propelled by a hand-crank. But it worked, and he was encouraged. Since that day he has produced, year after year, bigger and better underwater craft.

Unlike the alert, weather-beaten, sixty-eight-year-old inventor, those on board the five-hundred-ton Orphir, now tossing about on the stormy waters off Kinsale Head, Ireland, are not interested in proving the worth of a new salvaging device. Their goal is to reach the gold, diamonds, and jewelry believed to be in the locked safes of the ill-fated Lusitania, torpedoed on May 7, 1915, with the loss of 1,198 lives.

She is a rich prize. If Captain Russell, commanding the expedition, is successful in salvaging the treasure, he will be able, also, to settle the question as to whether or not the Lusitania was carrying munitions when she was sunk by a German submarine.

Capt. Henry Bell Russell served as an officer in the British Navy during the World War. He is a veteran of pearl-diving work in the Persian Gulf.

In the field of science, research and exploration never cease. This summer, the California Institute of Technology hopes to obtain further data on the cosmic ray, when four expeditions, working in New Zealand, the Philippines, Texas and on Pike's Peak, begin operations.

Treasure-hunters, land-mappers, inventors, scientists, explorers all. The urge to discover the undiscovered, the hidden lands beyond the hills, is not confined to them alone. Nor does age hinder.

Last week, nine-year-old, barefooted Johnny Crawford turned up on the steps of the White House in Washington, tired and hungry. He had "ridden the rods" from Charlotte, North Carolina, with the idea of calling on the President, who had called him "my friend" over the radio. Police found him, fed him, arranged to send him home. But Johnny is definitely one of the clan.

India Is Stirred By Ethiopian Issue

Dispute Is Regarded As Racial And Scathing Attacks Are Made Against Italy

Italy's policy toward Ethiopia is denounced throughout India, especially by the native-owned newspapers, which are scathing in their comments. The underlying attitude is an indictment of European policy and a cynical contempt for the expansionist aims of the Christian nations.

One Hindu newspaper, commenting on the proposed air invasion of Ethiopia, headed its editorial "Upward Christian Pilots," according to the New York Times.

The influential Madras newspaper, The Hindu, says: "The mission of Italy in Ethiopia, as judged by the utterances of her leaders and the trend of her diplomacy, is one of land-grabbing—by threats and negotiations if possible, by conquest if necessary."

Other newspapers show little faith that the League of Nations will be sincerely impartial, and some of them attack British policy as "hesitant in the face of a crisis so momentous to the colored peoples of the world."

The view generally held in India is that the dispute is fundamentally racial and that fate of Ethiopia intimately concern the non-white races. The ultimate attitude of the European nations on the question is being considered as a gauge to determine the honesty or otherwise of the imperialistic powers.

For historical reasons, it is thought the chances of Ethiopia's winning the support of France and Great Britain is somewhat remote, and consequently much interest is being taken here over the attitude of Japan. Even the United States, with her Negro population, is being brought within the orbit of Indian comment.

Concern has been expressed by several organizations in India over the safety of 2,000 Indians in Ethiopia in the event of war. These fears have been considerably appeased, however, by assurance from the British Government that the security of all British subjects has received the attention of London and the consideration of the Ethiopian Emperor.

Physiologists See Great New Field

Nerve Chemistry Dominates Discussion At The World Congress In Leningrad

It is curiously fitting that the first world physiological congress to be held in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which is a land of paradoxes, has itself a paradoxical aspect.

On the one hand, the prepared agenda and synopses of lectures and discussions indicate little novel or startling in the way of discoveries, says Watler Duranty in the New York Times.

The article from Leningrad on August 10 contines:

On the other, there is a general feeling that physiology is on the verge of a wholly new conception, or rather has already formed a new conception, of the human body, with consequences that cannot yet be estimated.

Nerve Chemistry Revealed

Until quite recently it was thought that the nervous system was chiefly mechanistic. Nerves were, so to speak, strings attached to levers and this caused muscles to function or glands to secrete. Now it is known that nerve-stimulus causes the production of a chemical substance that passes into the blood stream and can have all sorts of differnet effects.

Instead of being a comparatively simple mechanism, the body has now become a "drug store" with a complex physical chemistry in which many organs participate and are affected by a single nervous stimulus.

Professor Walter B. Cannon of Harvard read a paper today describing how he had been able to isolate such a substance—called sympathine, because it is derived from the action of sympathetic nerves—which produced certain effects when injected into the eye membranne of a chicken.

Thus far the experiments chiefly concern the effects of nerve stimulation, but it is believed and will probably soon be demonstrated that inhibitory effects are part of the same mechanism. Thus it might be theoretically possible to discover a chemical substance the injection of which would change human character.

Professor Cannon himself and other scientists here speak most cautiously about such general possibilities, but they feel their investigations may be leading up to something of that sort and that the field before them is far wider than what they have already covered.

Investigation of the structure and functions of the nerves, which clearly is one of the chief lines of present physiological research, was presented from a different angle today by Professor Kato, a Japanese, who demonstraed a microscopic dissection of a single nerve fiber, which gives a similar reflex to stimulation as a whole nerve containing thousands.

No less interesting was the lecture of Dr. Hallowell Davis and Fred Gibbs of Harvard, who showed that the human brain produces electrical waves, the differences in the frequency and strength of which vary and can be measured in natural sleep and anesthesia and in epilepsy and other maladies.

Here, too, for the time being it is only in the experimental stage, but the investigations may lead to new and surer diagnoses of diseases.

Many delegates with whom the writer talked here are eagerly looking forward to their visit to Moscow in order to examine the investigations there and Professor Koltzoff's gentic laboratory, which claims to have found an electrical method of distinguishing male-producing spermatazoa from those that produce female animals. The method is said to be 80 per cent correct.

A Thought for Dictators

This is enormously important in stock breeding, and although it naturally involves artificial insemination it might readily be applied to human beings. Adolf Hitler or Benito Mussolini might be overjoyed to learn they could have four boys out of every five births for cannon fodder in coming years.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Biggest Barn

In the late nineteenth century, Henry D. Watson, New England promoter and firm believer in the expanding western country, acquired a tremendous tract of land near Kearney, Nebraska, and named it the "1733 Ranch", because it was situated exactly 1733 miles from Boston and 1733 miles from San Francisco. At that time alfalfa hay was not accepted as satisfactory fodder for cattle and horses, but Watson believed in alfalfa and planted hundreds of acres of it. To house the crop he erected his "prairie skyscraper"—a barn 300 feet long, 100 feet wide, and 56 feet high—the biggest barn in the world. The crops came on, and still he had no market for the hay, so adjoining the barn he built a silo which, in itself, was capable of storing 160 acres of alfalfa. Watson then became known as the "Alfalfa King", and finally sold the midwest on his new hay, at an immense personal loss.

Until only a few weeks ago, the huge barn has been used as a dairy barn, but it was too big to operate profitably. It is now being torn down—a vanishing monument to the determination of the man who saw great futures and tried to make them real.

The Real Burden-Bearers

The St. Louis Star-Times

With State income taxes, sales taxes, property taxes, gasolin taxes, amusement taxes and whatnot to pay in addition to the large percentage the Federal Government exacts, the prospect is not inviting for the individual of small means. Government may start conscientiously to put the greater part of the burden on the rich, but such a burden always gradually shifts over toward the poor and those of moderate means.

Planes With 30 Berths Are Planned For 1936

waiting in the sun-drenched runway quickly becomes hotter than the proverbial oven.

Even at night in midsummer a plane at rest can become a pretty warm spot. For this reason auxiliary cooling and dehumidifying trucks, already in use at some terminals, will be attached to loaded planes while they are on the ground, the passengers will then be more comfortable in their seats or berths than they would be outside the aircraft.

One of the answers of the railroads to the challenge of air competition for de luxe service has been the air-conditioning of trains. There is nothing, however, about an airplane or its use, experts point out, that debars it from thoroughly efficient air-conditioning either in flight or on the ground.

A New Class of Travel

Sleeper plane equipment, developed with the full use of modern knowledge in the field, is expected not to make the present type of passenger transport obsolete, but rather to provide adequately for an additional class of the traveling public composed of those persons who require that their nights shall be spent in comfortable sleep so that they may use their days for either business or pleasure.

In addition to sleeper planes, larger and longer range passenger transports are on the horizon. Captain E. V. (Eddie) Rickenbacker, general manager of Eastern Air Lines, said recently that he thought the next step in plane development would be the two-engined or four-engined transport for thirty or more passengers in order to bring down the seat-mile cost of passenger transportation.

He believes that these planes will not show any great increases in speed performance over the present most up-to-date types, but will show much greater payload and thus make it possible for the airline operators to cut down their losses suffered under the sacrificial rates for mail carrying which have prevailed since the cancellation of the air-mail contracts early in 1934.

The increase in express as well as in passenger business, which has caused the booking up of planes weeks in advance this Summer and the running of many double sections on the active airline, is likely to go forward at an accelerated pace, Rickenbacker holds. The airline operators, therefore, are optimistic. They are seeking new equipment and finding it hard to get. They look forward to increased air travel, even as compared with the present year, which is setting a record.

At present more than 40 per cent of the flying of such lines as United and TWA is done at night. With the advent of bigger aircraft, and especially with the coming of fully modernized sleeper service, this percentage is expected to rise. Students of the subject believe that improvements in radio-beam service, the auxiliary use of radio compass and other aids to flight will bring what they call "low-ceiling approaches," more commonly known as blind landings, into routine operation in a year, or at most two years. These factors are expected to contribute favorably to an ever-growing use of the night skies.

League Hopeful Germany Will Return To Fold

imposed treaty can override the sovereign rights which all nations, in the present state of international law, possess. If it is permissible for France or Russia Czechoslovakia to judge for themselves what forces they require for their own protection, it is equally permissible for Germany. This does not mean that international accords cannot be reached on armaments limitation. On the contrary, only when there are no disabilities for particular nations, only when they can start, as it were, level, can such an agreement on limitations be freely negotiated. In the absence of such accords there cannot be two weights and two measures—one set of which applies to France and the other to Germany.

This futility of appealing to texts which have become obsolete, and which never had any validity except in so far as their execution could be assured by the menace of force, has been fully recognized by the British, who agreed to the naval demands of Germany for a fleet 35 per cent as large as that of England—a considerable proportion when it is remembered that England has to police the seven seas of the world while Germany has only its coast to defend. Have the French yet learned that the appeal cannot be to a "Diktat," but only to consented pacts? As soon as equality is, in fact, realized, which means as soon as the stipulations of the Versailles Treaty which touch national sovereignty in an invidious and unilateral sense are removed, it would appear that Germany can have no further justification for remaining outside the League.

Its Return Desired

Certainly its presence at Geneva is greatly desired; and certainly there are diplomatic opportunities in Geneva of which Germany is depriving itself by its absence. For it is in Geneva that much of the diplomatic work of today is done. The reappearance of Germany would be taken to imply a genuine desire to co-operate with the European countries. Herr Hitler and his colleagues have expressed this desire on many occasions, and have not received the response they were entitled to expect. Always has it been objected that words are cheap, and that some proof of this desire should be furnished. What proof? The answer is, clearly, the return to Geneva.

The League is looking with the greatest possible interest to the decision Germany should take very soon. While there were substantial reasons in the case of Germany, which was in an ambiguous and unsatisfactory situation, for withdrawal, the fact is deprecated that whenever a difference of opinion arises, the members of the League contemplate resignation. Japan went out, and Paraguay went out, as soon as the League rebuked them. Italy is openly declaring that if it is interfered with it will resign. Indeed, the Popolo d'Italia went so far as to see in withdrawal the possibility of evading international obligations. Referring to Japan, the newspaper which is the organ of Signor Mussolini says that it has brilliantly solved the problem by withdrawing from the League, thus reasserting full independence. "The example of Japan was followed by Germany, and thus the Reich won anew its full liberty. The priests of Geneva are the patriarchs of the past. But history is revolutionary. The young peoples who need a place in the sun end by withdrawing one after the other from Geneva. The League is an insurance among established empires and as such it will go on working, condemning all those who do not accept for eternity the existing injustices. The example of Japan and Germany shows that the mummification of history cannot be imposed and that presence at Geneva is a service rendered to those who benefit from it, not an obligation."

It is well that this view should be plainly expressed. But is it correct? Are there not real advantages, for those who seek for justice and a "new deal," in membership of the League? Can they not by their membership nullify the stereotyping tendencies of the League, and convert it into a dynamic organization? To leave it to static nations is surely a blunder. The League is precisely what its members are, and it is manifest that Germany, as a live power, can help to make the League what it should be.

Quezon Opposed By 3 Candidates

Aguinaldo, Bishop Aglipay And Racuyal To Be On Presidential Ballots Sept. 17

Threats of election violence having been subdued by an Interior Department warning, candidates are laying their foundations for the commonwealth Presidential campaign, which will end at the ballot boxes Sept. 17, says a Manila dispatch to the New York Times.

Four men are contending for the Presidency but it appears certain that victory will go to Manuel Quezon, insular Senate President and candidate of a coalition of the islands' two major political groups. Foes of the veteran political leader remained determined, however, not to give in without struggle.

Aguinaldo Is a Candidate

The colorful Emilio Aguinaldo, who led an insurrection against the United States, and the equally picturesque Gregorio Aglipay, Bishop of the Philippine Independent Catholic Church, are Mr. Quezon's principal opponents.

The Aguinaldo and Aglipay groups have charged that the Quezon coalition plan election frauds. A committee of Aguinaldo men called on Governor General Frank Murphy Friday and urged him to prevent "widespread violations" of the election statutes. As a result the Aguinaldo group was permitted to have one inspector at each polling place. The coalition will have three men at each polling place.

"I will instruct my men to murder election officials who commit frauds," Bishop Aglipay said in a recent statement.

An ensuing warning by the Interior Department citing the sedition laws resulted in the subduing of violence threats.

Two for "Forgotten Man"

Both Mr. Aguinaldo, running as a National Socialist, and Bishop Aglipay, as head of the Republican party, are self-styled champions of "the forgotten man."

Mr. Quezon and his running mate, Senator Sergio Osmena, represent a fusion of the former's Nationalist party and the latter's Independence party.

Pascual Racuyal entered the Presidential race as the filings closed last Thursday, but the other groups did not take his candidacy seriously.

Admiral Byrd, In Poor Health, Ends Activities

His health impaired, it is said, by the rigors of his last expedition to the Antarctic, Rear Admiral Richard Evelyn Byrd is in seclusion at his summer home at Bar Harbor, Maine, where it was learned he has been ordered to curtail all of his activities for an indefinite period. He hopes, however, to be sufficiently recovered by midfall to embark on a lecture tour of America, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The Admiral, forty-seven years old, has received the following letter from his physician, Dr. B. Harrison Ragle, of Boston:

"My dear Admiral Byrd:

"After a very careful survey of your situation we find it imperative that you have not less than three months' respite from your desk and from emotional and physical strain. There is a residual of the long illness and exhaustion that you experienced at the advance base that cannot be ignored without great hazard to your future.

"You must cancel all engagements and by means of this temporary retirement you will avoid the drain and strain that come from handling your mail, telegrams and telephone calls. This is of vital importance. You have no choice.

"Only by absolute observance of these orders will you be able by mid-autumn to pursue your usual routine."

Although his doctors thought he should enter a hospital, Admiral Byrd, his wife, four children and secretary arrived here July 4. Since that time he has spent the major part of his hours in bed. He retires early, rise late, spends the afternoon in bed and occupies the remainder of his time in short strolls and by sitting beside the waters of Latty Cove.

Ethiopia Receives Turks' Sympathy

Near Easterners Feel Lucky That They Are Not Objects Of Present Italian 'Fury'

In Turkey, as everywhere else in the world, the Italo-Ethiopian dispute is today one of the chief topics of conversation.

Turkish readers, when they see daily accounts of Italy's threatening attitude, shake their head, as much as to say: "The great powers still have not changed."

Then, as likely as not, they breathe a sigh of relief, which may be interpreted as:

Throughout the nineteenth century, and until the Treaty of Lausanne, Turkey, or rather the Ottoman Empire, was the happy hunting ground for the great powers, and her vast possessions from the Persian Gulf to the Danube were regarded as ripening fruits which might fall into their hands at any moment, says J. W. Kernich in the New York Times. Whenever a plum fell to one particular power, the others pretended righteous indignation until their appetites also were appeased.

It was only with the advent of Mustapha Kemal Ataturk that this constant denuding of the Turkish tree ceased and the foundations of the new Turkey safe from foreign aggression were laid.

Heed Paid to Defense

An ultra-nationalistic policy has since been followed, and particular attention has been paid to defense. This is often criticized abroad, but events in Africa show how right the Turks were. Had Ethiopia become a modern State like Turkey, with a highly trained army, it is doubtful whether its existence as an independent State would now be threatened. It may be recalled that Italy for many years cast longing eyes on parts of Turkey, particularly part of Anatolia, and that after the World War she occupied certain strategic points there.

If the new Turkish regime had been less prompt then to take steps to safeguard the country from any future foreign aggression, it may be assumed that the Italian need for colonial expansion would have found a goal nearer home and easier of attainment than Ethiopia.

The Turks are fully alive to this situation, and while sympathizing with the Ethiopians cannot help congratulating themselves that the Italian fury has been unloosed in another part of the world.

Finland Striving To Stay Neutral

Close Ties To Germany Do Not Prevent Her From Seeking Closer Link To Russia

The public in Finland, as in other States around the Baltic, is beginning to realize that the newly signed Anglo-German naval convention is bound to have far-reaching consequences upon the development of political events in the whole Baltic region.

Coming as it does soon after the negotiation of the Franco-Russia agreement, which also may have important implications for many North European countries, it is regarded as a further indication that these nations are gradually being drawn nearer the sphere of actual international schemes, says Marcus Toliet the New York Times recently.

The Franco-Russian treaty served in Finland to foster widespread uneasiness, though officially no sign of apprehension appeared, because it was held that world peace was endangered by a coalition between nations representing such diametrically opposed political principles and because the agreement was considered to be directed against Germany. On the other hand, the Anglo-German rapprochement was held to reduce the danger of an international conflagration and incidentally to stabilize the status quo in North Europe because it promises to preserve the European balance of power.

Claims of Germany

With her growing armaments, Germany naturally looms big in the present Baltic perspective, especially as viewed from the Finnish angle. Apart from the established dogma that any nation politically opposed to Russia is Finland's friend, Germany has strong claims to Finnish gratitude. Finland does not forget that Germany in 1918 sent an expeditionary corps to help the Finnish White army successfully fight the Bolshevik insurgents. But this does not oblige the Finns always to follow in Germany's political wake, and large sections of the public actually resent the present dictatorial German regime.

There remain, however, many economic and cultural ties as strong as ever, and present-day Germany carries on incessant political propaganda through all possible channels.

With Russia—Germany's chief Baltic rival—Finland also wants to maintain correct official relations, realizing the manifold valuable political and economic advantages that may be derived.

Faithful Dog Is Reason For Suspended Sentence

The man wasn't so much to look at and police said he was "very drunk" when brought to the Des Moines, Iowa, police station recently says the New York Times.

The man's dog was shaggy and bob tailed, but he followed the man to jail and into a cell. The dog followed the man into court and then to the police patrol wagon for a trip to the county jail and a two-day sentence.

Police shut him out of the wagon. He howled, snarled at the door, jumped in when the door was opened and crouched between the man's feet.

Police asked Municipal Judge Ralph Powers what to do about the dog.

"I guess,' said the judge, "that any man whose dog sticks to him like that must have some good in him. I'll suspend the sentence."

Molasses Flood Stalls Autos In Newark Street

Cars skidded and came to a halt on Prince Street, Newark, N.J., on August 9, in molasses. Molasses spread from curb to curb, and the street, normally congested by sidewalk business, became a tangled mess of traffic, with cars trying vainly to run through the thick fluid. A police radio car, responding to a call for help, got stuck too.

The police emergency squad was summoned and first tried sand, but that was absorbed without drying up the substance, says the New York Times. Then the squad turned on a hose and washed the molasses away. The street cleared promptly.

The molasses came from a seventy-two-gallon drum being unloaded from a truck in Prince Street. It slipped off the unloading skins, hit the pavement and burst open.

Brazilian Reds Lose All Headquarters

The headquarters of the Alliance National Libertadora, a communistic organization were closed recently by the police throughout Brazil following the decree ordering a six months' ban.

President Getulio Vargas's decree, according to the New York Times, states:

"Activities leading to the disruption of political and social order were fully proved by documents secured by the chief of police."

At the Rio de Janerio general headquarters members urged the alliance to fight, and then tore up their membership cards when the leaders did not respond. At noon today the police had closed twelve city branch offices, but did not get the books or membership rolls. Public and private meetings are forbidden.

The Integralista's first congress is now meeting here with Plinio Salgado presiding. The police chief asked the Interior Ministry for authority to cancel the mass meeting to be held tomorrow at the National Musical Institute, a government building.

Plum Crop

"What was your plum crop like?"

"Well, a heavy storm blew down 50 per cent of it, and we'd hardly gathered that when another wind blew down the rest."

"Bad luck. Could you do anything with them?"

"Well, my wife ate one and I ate the other."—Answers (London).

2 Years On Newspaper Held Ideal Police Course

Otto P. Higgins, Police Director, of Kansas City who drafted his daughter Caroll from a newspaper job for special detective work, wishes that his entire sleuthing force could have newspaper training. That is, all except Lieutenant Phil Hoyt. Hoyt was a reporter a dozen years.

"Reporting," Higgins said recalling his twelve years on "The Kansas City Star," "provides the best possible training for detective work." And Lieutenant Hoyt, in charge of the undercover and arson squad, is among the best detectives, Higgins said, according to a report in the New York Herald Tribune.

"A reporter must investigate every detail," Higgins said. "When he's sent on a story he knows he's supposed to get it. I would like to have every one of my detectives get two years of newspaper experience. Those two years would teach them more than a detective course, if one were available. A detective school could teach only theories. Reporting provides actual practice."

Leaving her work as society editor and reporter on a suburban newspaper, Miss Higgins passed two weeks investigating alleged violations of Kansas City beer ordinances. Nearly a hundred arrests resulted.

Finland Seen Turning To Reich-Polish Bloc

Poland's Foreign Minister, Josef Beck, accompanied by Secretary General Count Lubiensky, arrived in Helsingfors, Finland, on August 19 for a four-day official visit which in advance has caused unusually widespread comments in Polish, German and Russian newspapers as signifying a remarkable political event.

In various quarters abroad, particularly in the Soviet press, it is even rumored that Finland is inclined to join the Polish-German bloc directed against Russia, according to the New York Times.

Cordially greeting Mr. Beck, Finnish conservative and liberal newspapers apparently are anxious to emphasize the visit merely as an act of courtesy lacking all political implications. Consequently, the papers strongly deprecate the insinuations of the Soviet press as unfounded.

An outspokenly critical attitude, however, is taken by the leading Laborite organ, Suomen Sosialdemokrati which, after enumerating efforts during and after the World War to win the domination of East Europe, stresses the danger now threatening from Poland and Germany.

The journal adds that Finland must tell Mr. Beck that the nation absolutely refuses to serve as a tool in imperialists' hands and likewise declines to induce her neighbors to doing so. It insists that the Finnish Government clearly announce the country's foreign political attitude, because the present obscurity cannot continue. Parliament must make its will known in this matter, it says.

Cuba Sends Delegation To Thank US President

A committee of twenty-one representaitves of Cuban industry, agriculture, commerce, labor and press, headed by Jose Manuel Casanova, president of the Cuban Social and Economic Union, departed from Havana on August 10 on a Pan American Airways plane for Miami en route to Washington.

The delegation was to visit President Roosevelt to present a testimonil containing more than 300,000 signatures attesting the gratitude of the Cuban people because of the economic benefits obtained by Cuba from the United States Government as evidenced by the reciprocity treaty and the sugar quota, according to the New York Times.

The testimonial was started a week previously at a meeting of the National Sugar Producers Association so the public could express its gratitude to President Roosevelt for his efforts to tighten the bonds of friendship and commercial relations.

Among the delegates are Antonio Anton, Benigno Rodriguez, Angel Garri, Rafael Maria Angulo, Arturo Manas, Edelberto Farres, Alfredo Ceberio, Ricardo Moran, Ceferino Martinez, Jose Barraque, German Berl, Count Nicholas Rivero, Julio Montero, Guillermo Perez la Vielle, Agustin Lazo and Hugo Mamelis.

Pay Cut He Asked In 1931 Restored To King George

King George has had his pay cuts restored now that the depression is disappearing. In 1931 he voluntarily accepted a reduction of £50,000 a year in his civil-list payment.

This year, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer Neville Chamberlain, was able to announce the restoration of the remaining half of governmental pay cuts, the King saw no reason why he should not also receive his former payment.

The annuities of the King and Queen total £470,000, according to the New York Times. They include a private household purse of £110,000, £125,800 for salaries of the royal household, £193,000 for household expenses and £13,200 for royal bounty.

Powers Dodge Tangier Problem

Britain, France And Spain All Dissatisfied With Present Control

As far as can be ascertained at Tangier, negotiations for the revision of the International Statute of Tangier are at present proceeding through the ordinary diplomatic channels, says the correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor. This procedure is, in fact, in accordance with the statement made in the House of Commons in May last by Sir John Simon, then Foreign Secretary. Actually, although none of the great powers is content with the existing situation, none of them wants another conference about anything, least of all Tangier with its host of complex problems. And if the British Government has at long last been moved to action, that is simply because Great Britain's position here has been so prejudiced by the intrigues of other nations and the mischievous exploitation of the statute as it stands, that her own interests and the interests of the entire international experiment stand gravely endangered, says the article which continues:

Thus, while the financial situation is manifestly unsatisfactory because the doles from the French Protectorate (necessary to balance the budgets) are giving France an increasing lien on the place, and the Mixed Tribunal is so riddled with favoritism that no Englishman even expects to receive justice at its hands, there are other and graver issues in the background. For the time being, however, Britain has merely raised the questions of finance, justice and the ridiculously disproportionate representation of British officials in the Administration.

Negotiations

The Foreign Office is therefore negotiating with France and Spain, as the other powers principally interested, as to the best means to remedy hese delinquencies. If the idea of the British Government is thus to sidetrack an international discussion and patch up the existing statute without a formal conference, it is definitely on the wrong road. The statute is now an instrument to which eight powers have appended their signatures, and it is very clear about its term and the arrangements which must be made for its amelioration or alteration.

Its definite term is for 12 years from May 14, 1924, and Article 56 states that "it shall be renewed automatically for one or more equal periods if at least six months before its expiry (i. e. before Nov. 14) none of the contracting powers has demanded its revision." There is no provision for denunciation, but an obvious expectation of revision, from which we may conclude:

1. That the signatory powers regarded the main points of the scheme—internationalization, neutrality, financial independence, and the substitution of a Mixed Tribunal for the old consular courts—as definitive.

2. That they assumed that after 11½ years of experiment faults would have been found and lessons learned.

Any alteration, therefore, is to be met by revision, and that revision must be agreed to and accepted by all the signatory powers. Otherwise it would be illegal, and experience here suggests that its legality would be challenged whenever any of the powers considered that their interests had been adversely affected. It follows that revision by the process of diplomatic exchanges would be difficult and, in the application, dangerous.

Nobody Satisfied

Despite the patient moderation of the British demands, the mere mention of changes (and therefore revision) in the House of Commons fanned the smoldering ashes of discontent into flame. It did no harm, for the fire was there and all knew that the draft would come sometime and from somewhere.

Nobody, in fact, is satisfied. Nearly every power has some "grouse," the greater about their prestige or interests, the lesser about customs discrimination or some other matter. The Moors—better off here than elsewhere in Morocco—chafe at domination by the French authorities at Rabat, while the community as a whole feels that the development of the town as a tourist resort and a commercial center is being systematically stifled.

The British have declared what they want. The French, with a 75 per cent hold on the place, might have been satisfied; but they aspire to the actual inclusion of Tangier within their protectorate, in law and in fact, so that in due course they may incorporate the whole of Morocco in the French Colonial Empire. The Spaniards would like to include Tangier in their own zone (geographically, they have much the bect case) but, knowing this to be but a pleasant vision, are determined to destroy the French preponderance and principally challenge the French control of native affairs. Italy once had great pretensions, but has presumably been compensated by France elsewhere in Africa. The smaller powers cavil at domination by the great, but are content to seek fair play in the Customs sheds.

Thus, on the face of it, there is a good deal to discuss and even quarrel about within the framework of the statute. But once the palaver starts it will be practically impossible to keep out the larger issues.

French May Lose

The French know that unless they can take this current while it serves they will lose that part of their venture which aims at eventual annexation; but as they will almost inevitably lose it anyway they may not press their extreme claims to sovereign protection. It is, however, clear that today, as in 1919 and 1923, France will argue that as the Sultan is the sovereign authority and as France has taken over the Sultan's political rights, Tangier falls within the French protectorate. It is impossible to imagine that either Britain or Spain, or any other of the statutory powers would admit this pretension, but it will nevertheless be put forward, if only to have it on record again.

Spain has given a convincing answer to the French claim in her own Spanish zone, where she has effectively cut off all relations with the French protectorate and even set up the Caliph as the religious head of the Muslims instead of the Sultan. In Tangier she has acquired a heavy share of the administration, filtered in a large working class population, and will now endeavor to secure the post of Chief Administrator from France and—particularly—a share in the control of native affairs.

That Great Britain will insist upon a more logical place in the organization (she has hitherto allowed herself to be elbowed-out) may perhaps be taken for granted. The latest figures, which the writer has personally checked, show that the staff of the International Administration includes 102 French officials (30.47 per cent) 112 Spanish (24.89 per cent) as against eight British (3.43 per cent), and of these eight, only two are English and six Gibraltarians. British influence in the Administration, as in the Mixed Tribunal and the Legislative Assembly is therefore entirely submerged. Yet Urbaine, as against 28.78 per cent from Spanish and 21.74 per cent from French sources, while the economic existence of the city is dependent upon the income from British visitors.

Eliminating Britain

The process of eliminating British influence and establishing what is becoming virtually a Franco-Spanish condominium has been proceeding apace over the past 11 years. If it is allowed to continue for a further term, and if, in addition, Tangier is yearly obliged to accept French doles to square an unbalanced budget, there can be little reasonable doubt that by 1948 (the next date for revision) France will be almost in supreme control. This prospect inevitably drags in the strategic issue, for neutrality within a French Protectorate (the further growth of French influence would inevitably lead to that) would become almost impossible and France would in fact be in a position to close the Straits of Gibraltar almost at will. It is clear today that without a definitely neutral Tangier the value of Gibraltar as the guardian of the Straits would be practically nil.

There is only one answer to the problem, and it is so obvious and satisfactory an answer that only chauvinistic ambitions can oppose it. At the Cannes Conference (1922) Lord Curzon reminded M. Briand that in 1904 Great Britain had agreed to the French Protectorate in the Southern Zone on condition that Tangier should be international and neutral. This was admitted by the French statesman, and Lord Curzon then called for the inauguration of a bona fide international administration. It is admitted that that ideal has not been achieved by the Statute of 1923, and it therefore follows that in the interests of all the powers, and of the Moors themselves, a drastic revision should be undertaken forthwith. The strategic position of Tangier is such that its possession by any one strong power might easily provoke a European conflict. But, properly organized and fairly administered, it should yet become a laudable experiment in international government.

Filipinos Foresee Union With Japan

Quiet Economic Absorption Is Held Inevitable After The Islands Become Free

A few years ago apprehensions of possible internal disorders or probable seizure of these islands by Japan were a part of very discussion of independence in the Philippines. The fear of Japanese encroachment now has the stage to itself.

It was feared that the islands' many tribes or people—so distinct that each has its own language—would chafe under government by Tagalogs, whose Manila-bred politicians are in most of the big offices. That is not so vivid today, chiefly because the other peoples are more largely represented in the government, and again because any popular government, by acting promptly, can suppress an insurrection at home, says Junius B. Wood in an article to the New York Times from Manila recently.

Some jittery prophets still theorize that behind the all-embracing national aspiration for independence is a determination, hidden deep in the heart of the tao, or toiling peasant, to rise up as soon as the restraining hand of the United States is withdrawn and sweep the land clear of statesmen, land owners and all others who have profited from his labor. The slogan "Every Filipino a landowner" will answer that if the commonwealth is able to carry it out.

Absorption Not Unlikely

How to avoid the menace of absorption by a stronger nation, with Japan's expanding empire coming nearer and nearer, is not so clear.

That Japan will not come with battleships and armies and forcibly take possession in the next ten years, at least not without a protest and possibly resistance by the United States, is assured. That Japan ten years hence will not take possession is not so certain.

Many changes will come to the Philippines in the next ten years, and they have already started—in fact, they have been going on for several years. By Nov. 15, 1945, probably even before, the invisible ties of commerce, finance and mutual sympathy that now bind the Philippines to the United States, 8,000 miles away, will be sadly frayed or entirely broken, and similar ties will link the Philippines with Japan, only a few hundred miles away. The United States is shoving the Philippines out and Japan is leading them in. It may be part of the inevitable march of history.

Japan's occupation of the Philippines will be by the quiet but steady process of replacement of the dollar by the yen as the Filipino's necessity for existence. It has already progressed so far that every Filipino is aware of it. Last year the Philippines had an extremely favorable trade balance for these times. It was entirely due to free trade with the United States. With the closing of the United States to the Filipino he must accept other markets. He may not like them, but it will be a necessity.

Trend of Trade

In March of last year 83.2 per cent of the Philippine trade was with the United States and 4.6 per cent with Japan. In the same month of this year 71.8 per cent was with the United States and 9.8 per cent with Japan, despite the rush to ship to the United States before new tariffs and quotas became effective. The trend had started before independence was voted, and every incentive is for it to continue faster from now on.

Close to half of the islands' hemp is produced around Davao, on the island of Mindanao. Japanese colonists, according to studies made by The American Chamber of Commerce Journal here, produced 70 per cent of the Davao crop and Japanese dealers handled 73 per cent of it. Protection of similar Japanese interests and colonists was one reason Tokyo offered for taking possession of Manchuria.

The same result may not follow in the Philippines, but the trade expansion is quite evident.

When China boycotted Japanese goods, the predominant and firmly entrenched Chinese merchants in the Philippines followed suit. Japan protested and pleaded without result. Then Japan tried other tactics. In Cebu, almost in a night, two Japanese bazaars blossomed into nine, and it was similar in other cities. The Japanese stores still are here and are growing, and the Chinese, or even the Filipino, stores are not getting back what they lost.

At the present pace, Japan, at the end of ten years, will be so much a part of every throbbing artery of the islands that making them a part of the growing empire on this Philippine side of the Pacific may be merely an official gesture.

Four Products Exported

Sugar, cocoanuts, hemp and tobacco and their products form 93.30 per cent of the exports from the Philippines. That is the figure for the twelve months that ended Feb. 28, 1935. Though it varies every year, these same four products always are the foundation for the country's economic health.

Cocoanuts does not mean the nuts themselves, but copra, or the dried meat, which makes more than half of the total: cocoanut oil, desiccated cocoanut and cocoanut meat. Similarly, hemp, or abaca, includes cordage and knotted hemp as well as the raw fiber. Cigars are four-fifths of the tobacco exports.

The prosperity, or even existence, of the Filipinos depends on the cultivation of the four plants.

The United States encouraged the Filipinos to produce. American capital was invested in plantations, chiefly sugar, and in factories.

The Philippines were treated as a part of the United States. Their products and people entered the United States as if they had been grown in that country, though the Filipino always was assured that his country was only temporarily a part of the United States and that he, while not an alien, was not an American citizen.

This free entry of Filipino goods into the United States, because it is paid in pesos and centavos, was a stronger incentive, although indirect, than scholarly speeches or teachings of agronomists in inducing the Filipino to produce. Also, as the four major commodities were what the United States needed, the islands' economy centred on them instead of developing the diversified production that a nation needs to be independent.

Manuel Quezon realized this when President Roosevelt called him to the White House, conceded all his demands and urged Congress to pass the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Bill in March of last year. Possibly that was why he had presented so many objections to the pending bill. He may have adroitly expected that his demands would not be granted, as so often before, and that independence would continue a popular issue in the islands, keeping him in power. Instead, the Filipinos had it this time on their own terms, and there was nothing to do but accept it at the plebiscite of last May 14.

KARUIZAWA TOURNAMENT

The seventeen entries for the knock-out tournament this year included two new names, those of Mr. Wakefield and Mr. Janowski. Mr. Wakefield, a keen student of the game, showed his worth by defeating Dr. Hager, and only succumbed to Dr. Donat when four games had been played.

Four games were also necessary between Dr. Martin and Mr. Sington before the latter gained a lead. Dr. Martin had previously defeated Mr. Osburn and Mr. Chappell. The semi-finalists were Sington, Gatenby, Donat, and Janowski, of whom the last-named defeated Gatenby in the final. Last year's winner, Mr. Baumfeld, was unfortunately unable to take part this year.

The committee offer their congratulations to Mr. Janowski on winning the tournament without losing or drawing a single games, and are grateful to him for the advice and instruction which he kindly gave to opponents in practice games.

Indians Revive Songs Marking Cortes Defeat

Observe 415th Anniversary Of Retreat From Aztecs In Mexico City Suburb

Four hundred and fifteen years after Hernan Cortes suffered his most serious defeat at the hands of the Aztecs native groups performed an impressive ceremony recently to commemorate that eventful night. The observance was in the ancient village of Popotla, now a suburb of Mexico City and long famous for its giant Ahuehuete (Mexican cypress), known as the "Arbol de la noche Triste" (Tree of the Sad Night).

Legend has it that beneath these wide, gnarled branches, now heavily bowed with age, the Spanish conquerer wept bitterly after his tragic retreat from Tenochtitlan on July 2, 1520, says Jack Starr-Hunt in the New York Herald Tribune. From the near-by hills he and his small group of warriors could hear the wierd Aztec chants of victory, the piping of flutes, the rattlings of gourds and the shrill cries of the dancers that continued all night.

Songs That Live On

These songs and dances have not died, but on historic occasions, such as this, are revived as a fleeting tribute to the race. The bright sunlight of the Mexican morning revealed a variety of costumes that only by the greatest stretch of imagination could be called Aztec.

American sneakers peeped from beneath the gold fringe of a Roman toga; the brilliant plumes of a "redskin" ornamented the crown of a wandering minstrel; modern guitars replaced the ancient stringed instruments that now exist only in the National Museum. Yet, despite all this, the spontaneous enthusiasm that characterizes these native festivals was as contagious as ever.

Indians and Their Families

The ceremony was scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m., but long before that Indians from the surrounding countryside had begun to arrive with their big families, earthen pots of beans and the inevitable tortillas wrapped in large napkins. By 9 o'clock even the roof of the old Church of St. Esteban was occupied by a shouting group of children, who clung there precariously like birds.

The first group of dancers took their places beneath the tree, and in sad, cracked little voices began to sing of the warrior Cuitlahuace, who led his people to a brief victory, but one which will live in the hearts of all Mexicans as long as these songs are passed from one generation to another. Many of these dances are so old that their origin is lost, such as the Dance of the Vultures, which followed. Others, like the Dance in Defense of Tenoxtitlan, commemorate actual battles between neighboring tribes and the later battles of the Spanish conquest.

Simple, Rhythmic Dances

The steps are invariably simple; their beauty lies in the insistent, minor rhythms beaten first upon gourds, then elaborated by the singers. These songs recount a story in which each phrase is accented by a stamping of feet and the quick shake of the painted rattles which each performer carries in his hands.

The Tipica Orchestra of Mexico and the Mariachis, a group of native musicians that specializes in the popular music of the country, alternated with the dance. The chorus of the Department of Education presented traditional examples of Mexican choral music. As a special feature the president of the National Revolutionary party, Emilio Portes Gil, arranged for the Tamaulipecan Troubadours to sing their most characteristic numbers. Consequently there was not a region of Mexico which was not represented, either in song or dance.

Hungarians Find Way To Beat Filibuster Ban

Filibustering in the Hungarian Parliament was abolished recently by a law that every debate must end the day it starts.

The opposition thereupon launched an attack on Premier Julius Goemboes, starting it at such a late hour that it was nearly midnight when he got a chance to reply, says the New York Herald Tribune.

An old device was invoked, the official clock being stopped at two minutes to midnight, thus giving Goemboes his whole say.

Shotaro Acts As Blind Koto Player

Shunkin regrets having given the child to others.

There is a melancholy undercurrent to the play and a psychological study of a woman's character, but Shunkin's selfishness is disappointing and the extreme devotion of Sasuke hard to believe.

Farmers Clamor For Places In Alaska Colonies

Government Considering 'Super Colony' In Kenai Peninsula

Eager Americans clamored for a chance at frontier farming recently at Anchorags, Alaska as it was disclosed the Government is considering a "super colony" along Matanuska lines in Kenai Peninsula, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Mayor Don Brownell of Seward, returning from Washington, D. C., announced federal officials were thinking seriously of transplanting 2000 families from various parts of the United States to the peninsula, which lies between Anchorage and Seward.

At the same time Don L. Irwin, manager of the Alaska Rural Rehabilitation Corporation., said 650 farmers, representing every state in the union, have applied, hoping to fill vacancies in the ranks of the colonists in Matanuska valley.

Cite Long Experience

Some of the applicants "almost pleaded for a chance," said Mr. Irwin, and advanced their long experience "on farming frontiers," as reasons why they should succeed in the Government's and settlement project.

"These persons want to take the place of any dissatisfied colonists quitting or applying to quit the Matanuska Colony," Mr. Irwin said.

Mayor Brownell did not say how far advanced the plans were for Kenai Peninsula. He said he thought such a project would be marked by greater preparations for reception of the colonists than at Matanuska.

All necessary lands would be acquired in advance, roads would be built and buildings erected before the colonists were brought from their former homes, Mr. Irwin said.

Careful Preparations

Competent agents would be included among the colonists, and rigid examinations to show frontier farming qualifications would be required.

Mr. Irwin announced the names of all applicants for places at Matanuska were being filed and would form the basis for careful selection of colonists in any future movements.

Work at Palmer, the town nearest Matanuska, was progressing rapidly, Mr. Irwin said. He added that colony morale had improved. Lack of logs has led to erection of a number of frame structures to house colony families this winter. A large crop of wild hay has been harvested for the live stock.

Liberals Hold All Colombian Congress Seats

Take Over Government With Solid Ranks, But 3-Way Rift Is Predicted

For the first time in a century the Colombian Congress, which convened in Bogota on July 20, is formed exclusively of members of the Liberal, or Government, party. The Conservative party abstained from the recent Congresssional elections. Political observers here believe the principal object of the Conservatives in abstaining was to divide the Liberals in a contest in which they were without opposition and weaken them to such a degree that the Conservative party might win control of the government, which they have sought since 1930. The same observers were of the opinion that division within the ranks of the Liberals would rise soon after the opening of Congress, members dividing themselves into three groups: Center, Right and Left. At present it is not possible to predict which group will dominate the political situation.

The Senate is formed of fifty-eight Senators, elected by departmental assemblies chosen by the people in May. The House has a membership of 118, elected in May. In the last Congress the Conservatives had a majority of four in the Senate, the Liberals controlling the House by twenty-two votes. In previous Congresses in the last half century the Conservatives were in complete control of both houses of Congress, at times there being only one Liberal in the House and none in the Senate.

Proposed Legislation

The principal legislation recommended to the Congress by the administration in order of importance was:

"Ratification of the protocol of Rio de Janeiro, for settlement of the Leticia question with Peru."

"Ratification of new commercial treaties with the United States, Japan and France."

"Approval of the budget."

It is believed that the Rio de Janeiro treaty will be approved without debate. Enrique Olaya Herrera, Foreign Minister, an ardent defender of the protocol, is expected to address Congress on behalf of prompt ratification.

Approval of commercial treaties with Japan and France depend on action by Congress regarding the trade pact with the United States. The Colombian Minister at Washington, Miguel Lopez Pumarejo, recently came to Bogota to consult with the government on certain features of the proposed agreement.

Budget Bills Pending

Budget legislation includes a number of tax bills left unapproved by the last Congress, among which are a proposed tax on capital and an increase in income levies.

Leftist groups are expected to seek dissolution of the concordat with the Holy See, especially as regards government participation in religious instruction in primary and secondary schools. Inasmuch as more moderate elements are known to be opposed to any action tending to result in religious conflict, movement toward dissolution of concordat, it is believed, will produce a division among the Liberals.

Congressional action on agrarian and social legislation and on penal reform and a labor code is also likely at this session.

Gliders Used To Refuel Planes In Soviet Russia

Soviet airmen have carried out successful experiments with refueling in the air from gliders.

The glider-fuel ship is attached to the plane, making up an "air train," and gasoline is pumped to the plane through a hose, according to the New York Herald Tribune. It is believed that seven or eight of the fuel-gliders, called here "flying cisterns," can be drawn by a single plane.

Heads Are Transplanted On The Larvae Of Insects

Insects can get along as well with other insects' heads set upon their decapitated bodies as they can with their own, it appears from experiments performed here by Dr. Atma Malabotti of the Biological Research Institute of the Vienna Academy of Sciences.

Dr. Malabotti worked with the "nymphs" of grasshoppers and the larvae of other insects. He held their bodies in soft wax, anesthetized them, cut off their heads and quickly substituted heads of others of the same species. Later the insects were as active as ever.

All the insects had normal reactions and movements of legs and feelers. A few had somewhat abnormal wings, and others showed a scar zone where head and body joined. But even these apparently were not abnormal in any other respects.

Social and Personal Notes

DIED IN SHANGHAI

Mrs. Henry M. Landis, one of the early teachers in the American School in Japan and one of the founders of the Karuizawa summer resort, died in Shanghai Tuesday, September 3. She was with her daughter, Mrs. M. P. Walker of St. John's university there.

Mrs. Landis, who was the mother of Dr. James M. Landis, youngest member of President Roosevelt's brain trust, was born in Saxony in 1859. She came to Japan as a bride in 1888 and in 1890 spent her first summer in Karuizawa. She and her husband were the third family to arrive there, preceding the railroad. The trees were being cut down for the railroad that year and a few years later when her children were small, there was no shade for them to play in.

Of her early years in Karuizawa, Mrs. Landis was particularly fond. When she was in Karuizawa last summer, she spoke of those years in detail and told how her husband, upon his arrival in Karuizawa each spring, planted trees before he did anything else. They built three homes in Karuizawa, one of which was the first in Happy Valley and one of which is still at 1055 Shaw Road.

When her children were old enough to attend school, Mrs. Landis like many other mothers at that time, helped out with the teaching. Her work was chiefly music and German and at that time the school, now the American School in Japan, was known as the School For Foreign Children and it was located at Tsukiji.

Mrs. Landis was one of the well known residents of the Far East, and for years was a leader in musical and religious circles. Mr. Landis died in 1921, and she retired in 1924.

Mrs. Landis is survived by five children, Mrs. H. P. Walker of Shanghai, Mrs. Stephen Maddock of Boston, Mrs. Guido Goles, who is well known in musical circles of Cincinnati, George Landis who is an engineer with the Hudson Electric Co. of New York, and James Landis.

Attitude of N.E. States To Roosevelt Charging

Deal show of activity toward tightening up anti-trust law enforcement has added to the concern.

Sought to Break Party Lines

Mr. Roosevelt, from the beginning of his campaign for the Presidency, set out deliberately to break party lines. Farmer-Labor party in Minnesota and the Non-Partisan League in North Dakota, and by such individuals as Senators George W. Norris, of Nebraska; Robert M. La Follete, of Wisconsin, and Hiram W. Johnson, of California.

The President made this move at the cost of virtually driving out of the Democratic party conservatives like Senator Carter Glass, of Virginia; Josiah W. Bailey, of North Carolina; and former Governors Alfred E. Smith of New York, Joseph B. Ely of Massachusetts and Albert C. Ritchie of Maryland. The breaking of party lines, now as always, not only caused inevitable political bitterness but emphasizes the importance of personalities in the new political order. It started the stories of the Rooseveltian "Napoleonic complex," which have been intensified rather than modified as the President attacked and counter attacked to maintain his leadership.

The country in June and July, it is felt, has come closer to sensing the direction of the New Deal and the President's determination to hold it to that course. For two years after Mr. Roosevelt entered the White House the country was not quite sure where he was leading it. His earlier radical moves were discounted on the ground that economic conditions produced by the depression justified extreme measures.

Now They Know Where He's Headed

The councils of the Administration were divided between conservatives and radicals. First one and then the other of these groups appeared to be in the ascendency. So swiftly did the President zigzag left and right that it was difficult to be sure about his ultimate direction. This was so even though the course was set for a "little to the left of the center." The indication that he would change the Constitution to attain his ends did more than anything else, observers say, to establish the sense of direction in the mind of the country.

Different Man

The President, in the face of adversity, was proving to be a different man. He put himself more directly in the line of the opposition's his popularity. The discussion of it in the press irritated the President. His press conferences became less buoyant. Banter and wisecracking fell off. The President was beginning to fight. The first impression of him under fire has not been entirely favorable. His opponents insist he has shown he "cannot take it." His virtual repudiation of the whole press in the five-day tax-the-rich drive was notice to the correspondents corps that in politics as in military, war is war.

The effect of it all has been to intensify the debate about the President personally. It has become increasingly clear that he is the issue. He is coming under the same kind of fierce fire that Taft, Wilson, Harding and Hoover met. Signs are multiplying that the nation is in for a sanguinary political battle of unsurpassed bitterness.

Value of All-Steel Coaches Shown In London Crash

All Except Last Two Cars Withstand Shock And Continue Journey

Testimony to the life-saving potentialities of the last all-steel rolling stock with large standard type rubber buffers as now being introduced on British railways, is afforded by an accident at Welwyn Garden City recently, says the London correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

The accident was caused by one train traveling at 50 miles an hour overtaking on the same pair of rails another which was proceeding at only 20. The whole of the overtaken train was of the latest steel type structure. All expect its last two coaches withstood the shock entirely, and were able to proceed upon their journey. The front coaches had no casualties.

Still more remarkable was what happened in the overtaking train. The engine and the first three coaches of this train were all of the new steel structure type and escaped practically undamaged and without casualties. The engine, after being cleared from the wreckage, was able to proceed under its own steam. Its driver and fireman were unhurt.

Wood Telescopes

On the other hand the central and rear coaches of the overtaking train, which were of the older wood and steel type of structure, were telescoped more or less completely, with resultant heavy casualties. This was despite the fact that they had in front of them and between them and the collision a buffer of three steel coaches and engine, all of which escaped material damage.

The only steel constructed vehicles which were smashed were the two lost ones of the overtaken train. The terminal coach suffered most, and had many casualties. The last-but-one was damaged to a serious extent, but not sufficiently to cause many casualties.

What occurred was similar to that which happens in the familiar physical laboratory experiment of shooting a soft candle from a gun through a hard plank. The engine of the overtaking train, being of heavier construction than the rear coach it struck, smashed its way completely through the next. Casualties resulted, but were much reduced in numbers owing to the splendid resisting power of all the newly constructed vehicles.

Inquiry Ordered

An inquiry is being held as to how the two trains came to be upon the same rails at one time. In this connection Lord Monkswell, a British railway expert, says a mechanical system is in force upon some railways here by which as soon as one train enters a section, that section is automatically closed to all following traffic until the line is clear. The system is expensive to install but is expected to be extended, as it is claimed to afford an almost complete guarantee against failure of the human element in preventing a large class of accidents.

Inquiries made by the Monitor of the Great Western Railway, one of Britain's chief lines, shows that that organization is now working this system so successfully as to enable a train to run safely apart from the efforts of the driver.

The system consists of two sets of apparatus. Both are operated automatically by a plate on the bottom of the engine engaging with a lever connected with the rails. The movement of the lever automatically sets a signal against any following train. It also locks the signal in that position so that it cannot be similar mechanism when the train leaves a station further on.

Safety Signals

The sections between the signaling stations vary in length according to the nature of the traffic. The arrangement means that no train can enter a section containing another train without running in defiance of a clearly marked signal. The second set of apparatus makes absolute the partial protection this affords.

It is similarly operated. It is so arranged that if a train does enter a section where the signal is set against it, the vacuum brakes are automatically released by electrical contact. The train is thus stopped and cannot on go again until the signal has been changed by the departure of the blocking train from the section.

At the same time the driver of the trespassing train is warned by a light going up and a hooter being started in his cab. Even if a driver cannot, or does not see that a signal is set against him therefore, he is pulled up and warned and also prevented from going any further until the line has been cleared.

A very similar system is in use, the Monitor learns, on the Paris-Lyons Marseilles railway in France. The invention is open to other railways to adopt.

Pork Chops Sell For 4 Times 1934 Price At Chicago

Traffic In Porkers At The Lowest Ebb In 57 Years

Nature's excessive co-operation with a man-made plan for price raising was cited by meat authorities recently at Chicago to account for the position of pork in the food list, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

While housewives dug deeper into their purses, half of the hog pens in the world's greatest swine market were closed because the traffic in porkers was at the lowest ebb in the 57 years for which records are available.

It was reportedly the first time part of the facilities was closed because of a paucity of receipts.

Reminiscent of Boom Era

Pork prices have lifted to levels reminiscent of the "boom" era. Retail purchasers paid in some instances four times as much for pork chops as a year ago. Packers paid above $12 for pork, the first time in years hogs had hit the $12 mark.

The cause was attributed to:

1. The 1934 drought during which farmers got rid of their hogs as quickly as possible to avoid losing them from heat, thirst or starvation.

2. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, which provided for the destruction of 6,000,000 piggy sows or grown sows which would have been on the market this year. In addition, uncounted prospective litters were destroyed.

Receipts at the Union Stockyards for the first four days of the week totaled 33,600 head of hogs, while in the same period a year ago 88,631 head were received. The estimated figure for the week is 39,000, the fewest on record. To date this year hog receipts amounted to 2,229,000 head, compared with 4,045,000 hogs received by this date last year.

Employment in the yards had fallen to about 200 hog handlers, where the average is 700 to 800. A year ago 860 were employed.

50 Cents Pound in Cleveland

Pork chop prices to the consumer showed much variation, ranging from 17 cents a pound at Des Moines, Iowa, to 50 cents in Cleveland. Chicago offered chops at 39 cents, 10 cents higher than a week ago and four times the price offered at times last year.

Des Moines, in the heart of the pork producing area, had the low price on hams also with 19 to 25 cents a pound asked. The price ranged up to 35 cents. Pork roast was as low as 17 cents of Oklahoma City, and from 35-2/3 to 37-2/3 cents in New York. Milwaukee bought roast at 50 cents.

Most cities quoting prices in an Associated Press survey showed pork chops selling between 30 and 40 cents, Denver, at 25 cents, St. Louis at 22½ cents, Lincoln, Neb., at 25, and St. Paul at 18 to 23 were well below the general figures, however. Hams ranged in the 20's and low 30's, while most cities reported bacon selling in a range from 35 to 45 cents. Lincoln, with bacon at 19 cents, was low. Detroit had the highest figure at 45.

Temperance Drive Begun By Two Spanish Doctors

A movement to form an "anti-alcohol league" in Spain to encourage temperance has been begun by two well-known psychiatrists, Drs. Eduardo Varela de Seijas and Antonio Garcia Munoz.

In a letter calling for public support of the movement they declared that, while drunkenness was no problem in Spain, the amount of alcohol consumed was injurious, according to the New York Times. They said temperance was particularly important for the welfare of children, who otherwise might inherit feebleness from alcoholic parents.

Spaniards draw a sharp line of distinction between "alcohol" and wine, the latter being considered merely a harmless beverage.

The Hot House of Lonoke

An old house, which had been standing about 60 years, in Lonoke, Arkansas, first caught fire from defective wiring, and after repairs were made and the walls repapered, a new fire would break out every few days. The wallpaper was not the ordinary kind, but a sort of paper sheathing tacked onto the board walls. After 47 of these fires detailed investigation was made, and it was decided the fires were spontaneous, a chemical action that resulted from the paper sheaths being put on while wet.

"False Tail" Susan

A huge red-tailed hawk was actually trained to falconry despite the loss of its tail. Susan, as the hawk is called, broke its own tail off hopelessly short in trying to evade capture, but lost the struggle. However, Captain C. W. R. Knight, well-known English naturalist, took the tail from a museum specimen and sewed the feathers onto Susan with a needle and thread. The new tail functions perfectly and the hawk became a very efficient bird. This process is known as "imping."

Gareth Jones Was Capable Linguist

Late Journalist, Killed By Bandits, Spoke Russian, German And French As Well

Mr. Gareth Jones, the newspaper correspondent, whose murder by Chinese bandits was reported recently, was particularly fitted for journalistic work abroad by an exceptional gift for acquiring foreign tongues.

At Cambridge, where he was senior scholar of Trinity College, he reached a first class standard in every language he studied, and it has been said that in Russia, Germany, or France he spoke so well that he might easily have been taken to be a native of either of those countries. From a child he was bilingual, speaking Welsh and English, says the London Times article which continues:

Gareth R. Vaughan Jones was born on August 13, 1905, and was educated at Barry County School, of which his father, Major Edgar Jones, was headmaster until his retirement about two years ago. His university education was received at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, at Strasbourg University, and at Cambridge. At the last named he obtained first-class honors in French and German in the Modern Languages Tripos Part I., with distinction in the Oral examination, and in Part II., for which he read French and Russia, he also was placed in the first class. He travelled extensively in most countries in Europe, was a member of the Ore Mountains (Saxony) Tramping Club, and about two years ago made a long walking tour through the Ukraine and other parts of Russia.

Before he went to the East Gareth Jones had occupied several positions of responsibility in England. He went back to Cambridge for a time as a lecturer in languages, and then he became a member of Mr. Lloyd George's secretariat shortly after 1929, remaining in that post for about 12 months.

Gareth Jones had for a number of years taken a deep interest in international questions. While at the University he was assistant secretary to the Cambridge University League of Nations Union, and in course of time he became exceptionally well informed about political, social, and educational questions and conditions of Continental countries. He had contributed two series of articles on Russia to the columns of The Times.

Those who came into contact with Gareth Jones were impressed by the nimbleness of his mine and the rapidity with which he mastered languages. He had a clear head and a particularly retentive memory, and his common sense and good humor made him always popular at school, at college, and in later life. The day on which he was reported to have been shot was his thirtieth birthday.

Mr. Barnett Janner, M. P., president of the London Barry Society, writes:—

The untimely death of Gareth Jones has come as a severe shock particularly to those who, like myself, have known him intimately. He had already achieved outstanding academic success, and he had a keen valuation of world affairs. Above all he was a gentleman, and his personality endeared him to all with whom he came into contact. I remember him from his early boyhood. At that time I was a student at the Barry County School, of which his father, Major Edgar Jones, was headmaster. The major and his wife undoubtedly left the impress of their sterling characters upon their son. Warm indeed is the grip of their hand of friendship, and so was his; upright, and fearless are they—so was he. A brilliant career has been cut short abruptly and the world is deprived of a man whom it could ill afford to lose. Past students of his school and the members of the London Barry Society deeply mourn his loss.

Hand-Drawn Music For Films Being Developed

the proper order he made a recognizable three-minute sound film of Rachmaninoff's much played C sharp minor prelude and of the "White Monkey" fox trot.

Labor-Saving Device

But B. Sholpo of Leningrad finds this still too complicated and tedious. He cuts out geometric patterns in a disk, whirls the disk as he projects their images on a screen. Behold! Jagged comb or saw teeth, which, when photographed on a film, can be converted into musical sounds. This saves a tremendous amount of tedious drawing.

Play a Sousa march on the phonograph at one speed of revolution and the notes well out at a certain pitch. Increase the speed and the march is played not only faster but at a higher pitch. So when Sholopo wants to make notes shriller he simply spins the disk faster. On the other hand, slower speeds give him lower notes. With such disks he managed to piece together photographs of images which, on the sound track of a film, played the large of Dvorak's "New World Symphony", and the hackneyed Toreador's song from the opera "Carmen."

Perhaps Avranov and Yankovski of the Potylkha studios, Moscow, are the most ingenious of all. They can take a curve which shows the rise and fall of stock quotations and convert it into something that sounds like a moan or a whistle, depending on the ups and downs and indentations of the slopes and peaks. In fact any recurring ornamental design will do. They have even gone so far as to combine and play silhouettes of faces. The tones that resulted were like those of a violoncellio.

Avranov and Yankovski see possibilities in retouching the tones of familiar instruments. They think that the attack of a violin bow—the momentary rasping of horsehair on catgut—is not particularly pleasant. So they doctor the proper part of the note as it appears in black and white. Result: A finer timbre, in their opinion.

Improving Piano Notes

But it is the mechanics of artificial tone production quantity production, that interests the two most. They select an octave—the eight notes played by some instrument which gives rich values from fundamental to the last overtone. They obtain all the other notes in the scale by rephotographing this black-and-white picture in different sizes. Thus they collect the material for piecing together a scale which runs from the deepest to the highest obtainable note. The same timbre is preserved throughout—an advantage. The treble notes of a piano as we hear them ordinarily have a tinkling quality. But Yankovski says that his are much fuller. Other instruments are even more limited and can therefore be correspondingly improved.

It may be that in what the Russians call "acoustic design" we have the beginning of a new art which supplements that of the animated cartoons. It is not likely that the richness of a Beethoven symphony or of a Wagnerian opera can ever be put down in black-and-white sawtooth silhouettes. On the other hand it may be possible to create just the bizarre effects which a Walt Disney may want and which may lie beyond the scope of any instrument—even of the versatile electron tube.

German Expedition Into Hindu Kush

Comes Into Contact With Strange Tribes Possessing Novel Characteristics

A German expedition exploring Nuristan (Land of Enlightenment) in Afghanistan is working its way through the Hindu Kush Mountains into Chitral, seeking the origins of wheat and making general botanical researches. The expedition is coming into contact with strange tribes possessing novel racial and linguistic characteristics and endowed with an unusual history, says the Simla correspondent of The London Times.

Among these tribes are the Red Kafirs, locally known as Bashgalis, who are to be found in small numbers in the sequestered valleys of Bimboret, Rambur, and Urtsun on the western borders of Chitral. They are known as Red Kafirs to distinguish them from the Black Kafirs, a race darker in complexion and less developed in intellect. Originally pagans, they were termed Unbelievers (Kafirs) by their Moslem rulers.

Legend says these Kafirs came from Arabia, wandering through Central Asia into Afghanistan, where they eventually found havens in the valleys of the Hindu Kush, to the north-east of Chitral. Formerly known as Kafiristan, the land they now live it is called Bashgal and their language and its dialects are known as Bashgaliwar.

According to Captain Cobb, formerly Assistant Political Agent in Chitral, the Red Kafirs were forcibly converted to Islam by Amir Abdur Rahman Khan, and little remains of the pagan beliefs and rites they formerly practised. A few families, unwilling to embrace a new faith, fled into Chitral in 1895 to avoid religious persecution. They have gradually yielded to the pressure of Islam, which surrounds them, and only a few remain unconverted. These few preserve pagan customs which have survived since their early pilgrimages. These survivals to some extent resemble the customs of the ancient Greeks, inspiring the belief that the Red Kafirs may be descendants of the army which Alexander the Great led into the neighborhood in 326 B.C. But their language has no trade of Greek origin.

Strange Dances

Recent researches indicate the tribe to be an Indo-European race, and they are authoritatively said to be a genuine Aryan people, strongly influenced by their Indian neighbors. Their religious ceremonies are marked with strange dances. These take place in a central courtyard of the village, whose house are rudely built of wood and are generally of two storeys. In the center of the courtyard stand a crudely made altar, consisting of a pillar surmounted by a large flat stone. Round this altar is a circular stage, upon which the ceremony takes place. It consists of singing and dancing alternately, and comprises a variety of different phases, each of which is accompanied by music with a separate air and chorus. The music is supplied by kettledrums and wooden flutes, with a high and plaintive note. The conductor is usually a venerable priest.

The Kafirs in earlier years were famous for their inroads upon Moslem traders, as they passed in pursuit of their precarious livelihood along the closely wooded paths in the neighboring valleys. The traders fell an easy prey to the Kafirs, who were skilled in the use of the bow and arrow and the battleaxe. A peculiarly shaped axe is carried by the men while dancing, and is waved about the head or spun in the outstretched hand in time with the music. The singing of the dancers is unlike that of other tribes on the border in that it has a rhythmic air easily captured by the European ear.

Before beginning their ceremony the Kafirs brew a rough but pungent wine from the grape and make themselves merry. On the altar simmers a smoking bowl of sweet scented cedar wood, symbolic of the burnt sacrifice and the mystic presence of the deity. The deity Imra has been identified with Yumaraja or Mava, a Hindu or debased Buddhistic deity of death, who was of Indian origin.

Statues of Dead Heroes

The tribe indulges in feasting and dancing for weddings and funerals. The dead are placed in rough wooden boxes, several members of the same family being placed in the same box. These coffins are stored in places of special merit on the hillside or in sacred groves, where in due course they fall to pieces, when the skeletons are devored by birds and animals of the forests. Food, wine, bow and arrows are placed inside the coffins to enable the departed to enjoy the pleasures of the chase where they have gone. Dead heroes are commemorated in a remarkable manner. Great wooden statues are made from solid pine trees. The men are depicted as seated on horseback, sometimes followed by an attendant, while their wives are seated on chairs behind them. These statues are placed in low-walled enclosures near the main thoroughfare.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

From the Cradle to the Grave

The famous French author Chateaubriand (1768-1848) was born on September 4, 1768, upon a rock near the harbor of St. Malo, France, on which his parents were cast away in a shipwreck. As soon as he grew to manhood, the writer purchased the rock, directing that he be buried on the same spot after death. His wish was fulfilled, and Chateaubriand's grave now stands on the identical spot where he was born.

Remenji

Edouard Demenyi (1830-1898) was a native of Hungary. In the Hungarian rebellion against Austria in 1848, he joined his country's army. During the War, and for many years thereafter, while he was proscribed by the Austrian Government, he went about Hungary playing patriotic songs and inflaming the Hungarians into the resistance against the Government of Vienna. Recognizing the great danger, the Austrian Government issued an official decree providing death penalty for Remenyi's playing. Six times various extraordinary courts sentenced Remenyi to death in absentia, or violating the decree. They were unable to execute the sentence, however, because the violinist escaped their pursuit time after time. In 1860 Remenyi was amnestied and returned to Hungary, to an enthusiastic official reception by his Government.

Afrikanders Hold Segregation Best

Policy Of Adaptation Preferred To That Of Assimilation For Native Blacks

Complete segregation of the black races from the white in South Africa is being advocated by the Afrikaner Race Relations League at Pretoria, South Africa, says the Christian Science Monitor's correspondent.

At one of its recent conferences the League appealed for the education of the natives in their own language and denounced the attempts to make "cheap white men" of them.

E. G. Jansen, Speaker of the House of Assembly declared that the majority of Afrikanders preferred the policy of adaptation to that of assimilation.

There were certain axioms in the relationship between black and white in South Africa, he said, the chief of which was that there must be no intermarriage. If this axiom was not recognized, civilization must fail, the speaker contended.

In his opinion, the worst mistake the Afrikander had made was to take it for granted that his civilization was best for the black man. This was clearly not the case and irreparable harm had been done by the assumption.

Educated natives were asking for the restoration of tribal life, and therein, without a doubt, lay their salvation.

To help the native to develop along his own lines, Mr. Jansen contended, was the greatest service that could be done for him.

Legislation must be passed to effect some amelioration in the position, he pleaded. It was to be hoped, Mr. Jansen concluded, that the history of the past 100 years had taught South Africans something and that they should be able to prevent further clashes. No man could fail to sympathize with the Bantu for the sad plight in which he was today.

US Social Security Bill Aims To Aid 30,000,000

pectation of the ultimate passage of an act along the lines of that signed today by the President.

It was expected that the unemployed would register at Federal-State employment offices which would certify to the period of idleness, after which the applicants would go to another window in the same room or in an adjoining room or building where his unemployment check would be made out.

Cooperation Is Planned

Since the Social Security Board is an independent body, the problem of arranging for an efficient method of certifying the idle employe's books will be wholly in the province of that board, and a method different from that prevailing in other countries for handling payments may have to be evolved.

The old-age section of the law is divided into two parts: old-age assistance and compulsory contributory pensions.

States that follow standards set up in the law will receive half of the old-age pension payments provided that after 1940 all over 65 who require this form of relief shall receive it. Up to that time the age limit will be 70.

The government will not pay ite 50 per cent share on pensions above $30 a month. On these it will pay $15 a month.

Some thirty-one States have old-age pension laws on their books but not all of them are paying pensions, due to delay in making appropriations.

The law requires that a State pension act, to be recognized for the purpose of the Federal appropriation, may not have a State residence requirement for the applicant exceeding five years in the last nine years.

Pension For Aged Indigents

The old-age assistance law which grants free pensions to the aged indigent is designed for the working man who has passed his period of employment and who is destitute, living possibly in an alms-house.

Supporters of the measure hope that in time all wage-earners in the nation will be protected under the second old-age section of the law, thus covering contributory old-age pensions. This section provides for an annuity when a worker reaches the age of 65 after he and his employer or employers have made joint payments into the "old-age fund."

Payments into this fund begin on Jan. 1, 1937. The payment will be 1 per cent of the payrolls jointly for three years, and it will be increased gradually each three years until the total joint payments reach 3 per cent of the payrolls.

All industrial wage-earners will be expected to make contributions to the fund, no matter what their income. But the payroll deductions will cover only that part of their income up to $3,000. So that a $10,000-year man will be entitled to an annuity covering his contributions made up to $3,000 of his salary.

Pensions will vary in amount with the period of employment and the month salary. They may be from $17.50 to $81.25 a month. Thus a man with an average salary of $50 a month, with ten years of contributions will receive $17.50 and this will increase to $32.50 after forty years of payments.

Sportsmen Unite To Save Wild Life

33 Prominent Citizens From All Parts Of US Declare War On 'Enormous Waste'

The formation of an organization known as the American Wild Life Institute to assist government and private conservation agencies in protecting wild life and restoring its natural habitat wherever possible was announced recently by Thomas H. Beck, president of the Crowell Publishing Company, according to the New York Times.

The institute was formed, he said, as a result of letters sent to forty-nine leading sportsmen throughout the nation suggesting the idea and asking for cooperation. Thirty-three agreed to cooperate, three gave excellent excuses, and the rest did not respond, he said.

At a meeting in the Chrysler Building, Walter P. Chrysler was elected chairman of the board of trustees; Herbert L. Pratt was named vice-chairman; Powell Crosley Jr., chairman of the executive committee, and Frederick C. Ewing, vice chairman of that committee. Mr. Beck was elected president of the institute and Charles S. McVeigh vice-president.

Present Methods Criticized

The thirty-three trustees include leading sportsmen and industrialists from Texas to Saskatchewan, and they are men, according to Mr. Beck, who are "fed up with the random, loose, and oftimes politically controlled conservation and restoration methods of professional game savers."

One of their first objectives will be the banning of the word 'conservation. Mr. Beck, who is a member of President Roosevelt's committee on wild life restoration along with J. N. (Ding) Darling, cartoonist and chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey, and Aldo Leopold of the University of Wisconsin, prefers the term "restoration."

"Our aim," he said, "is to restore the environment necessary to natural breeding and nesting. There has been an enormous waste of natural area, by deforestation, over-grazing, erosion, and by the reduction of natural water levels in efforts to reclaim land for unneeded agricultural purposes.

"We shall cooperate in this with the Biological Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries and with nonpolitical fish and game commissioners.

"We know those politicians who spend 85 per cent of their appropriations for wardens and wardens' cars, and they can expect little help from us. They probably won't like us much either. We're out to improve conditions for ducks, you see, and ducks can't vote."

Project "Amply Financed"

The institute is "amply financed," Mr. Beck said, and it will try as its first step to bring into cooperation with government agencies all other wild life groups, "shooters and non-shooters." It will back government projects that it considers worthy and will bring conditions inimical to wild life to the attention of State Legislatures.

"This is business in government," said Mr. Beck, who is chairman of the Connecticut Fish and Game Commission and lives at Wilton, Conn. It was he who developed the idea in Connecticut of "ladies day" in the trout streams.

He incurred the wrath of fox-hunters in his State in 1933 when he proposed a $300 hunt club license fee.

The money thus collected was to replace the game birds and animals distributed and eliminated by fox hunters. His proposal also included a provision to prohibit hunting on land without written permission of the owner.

The restoration of natural conditions for any one type of wild creature would bring a return of other species to the restored area, he said, and the result would be disastrous to insect life.

"When we try to bring about the return of the Connecticut 'partridge,' he said, "we also make things homelike for the cuckoo. If Connecticut had more cuckoos, she would have a lot fewer of those tent caterpillars."

German Photographic Art On Exhibition

Shirokiya Department Store Is Showing Work Of Famed Camera Man

Above is one of the studies in the arresting exhibition of photographs by Mr. Paul Wolff, well known German camera artist, which is now being held on the fifth floor of the Shirokiya department store.

The picture is not of Mr. Wolff. Search for the photographic artist led to the discovery that Mr. Wolff is not, nor ever has been in Japan. His fame has just run ahead of his travels. The pictures were obtained by Mr. Y. Natori, editor of the smart "Nippon" magazine and president of the Nippon Kobo Publishing Company which, with the "Asahi Camera," photo magazine of the Asahi Shimbun, is sponsoring the exhibit. Mr. Natori has 1,000 photographs taken by Mr. Wolff.

For the absent camera man, it must be said that he has an uncanny skill in photography. His models do not wear the pained expression which denotes having one's picture taken. They appear to have been caught at off-hand moments and few of them were facing the camera.

For more than 200 of the pictures, Mr. Wolff has used his wife as the model. She is not a healthful woman but Mr. Wolff has illustrated that a face is but one point in the total score for beauty. One, a side view, reveals a beautifully curved arm with an elbow dimple—but it is not just a picture of an arm. They are animated pictures, contemplative pictures . . . they define a mood and an individuality.

Mr. Natori has brought the photographs to Japan to sell for commercial advertising purposes. He believes that photographic advertising is under-developed here. He visualizes ads of such high pictorial beauty that the reader will turn to the advertising columns of a paper before he reads the news.

It can be granted readily that any one of a number of the photographs on display could sell cosmetics along with some slogan such as "The skin you love to touch," or that the wide-eyed baby stuffing his face with one hand and reaching for more with the other, would sell any food article and a slogan such as "They cry for it," would be unnecessary. Use of the wrinkled old man philosophically considering his pipe, is not hard to place. If Mr. Natori is successful, perhaps hard working reporters can lay off and let the advertising department take over the papers.

It has been said that Japan is in the midst of a photographic craze. The crowd at the exhibit bears out this statement. The gallery was packed Monday afternoon and no one seemed in the mood to move. The exhibition will continue to Thursday and then be taken to Kobe, Osaka, and Nagoya. For anyone mildly interested in photographs, it is worth a trip to see.

NY Mayor Asks Aid Of Public Against Noise

Asks 108 Organizations To Nominate Members Of An Advisory Committee

In his drive to eliminate unnecessary city noises, Mayor F. H. LaGuardia of New York City announced on August 17 that he would appoint an advisory committee to work with Police and Health Department officials during September in the educational campaign to precede enactment of ordinance against honking of automobile horns and other nerve and sleep shattering devices.

Most of the members of the committee will be representatives of chamber of commerce, trade associations, civic and church groups, settlement houses and similar organizations. The Mayor has invited 108 of these societies to name their representatives, according to the New York Herald Tribune. When this is done, he will fix a day for the first meeting at City Hall, at which he will discuss his anti-noise drive in detail.

"All unnecessary noises can and will be eliminated if we have the support of the public," said the Mayor, "and in line with the Mayor's custom, as many disappointed politicians can testify, the Mayor finishes anything he starts."

"Through the co-operation of the public with the Police Department, New York City has been made the largest safe city in the nation, and with an equal degree of public support we can abolish the noise nuisance."

Self-Discipline Advised

After suggesting that the creators of unnecessary noises go into training now, so as to avoid the penalty of violating a city ordinance, the Mayor said:

"Many drivers impatiently honk a horn when traffic is jammed. That doesn't help any. If there is a jam it is obviously because a car was stopped and cannot be moved. Patience on the part of drivers will be a tremendous help. Drivers who use raucous horns to summon friends from buildings and to awaken garage men are among those who shoud go in training now."

In his letter inviting the co-operation of the 108 organizations, the Mayor said in part:

"The campaign is being undertaken with no thought of working hardship on any one, but rather to bring about results which will prove beneficial to all. In a city the size of ours, noise cannot be completely abolished, but many unnecessary raucous sounds which mar the peace and quiet to which every citizen is entitled can be eliminated if proper co-operation is obtained from all.

"During the month of September the campaign of education will go forward under the auspices of Deputy Commissioner Harold Fowler, of the Police Department, Dr. John L. Rice, Commissioner of Health, and various city departments. During October and subsequently, up until the time we are able to pass noise abatement ordinances, the police will give warnings to offenders.

"I am seeking your cooperation in bringing to the public in every way possible the necessity for each person to do his or her little bit in keeping the noise evil to a minimum.

"The administration will appreciate any steps you may take in this campaign in the way of educating the public through stickers, bulletins, or any other means you may think best."

The Mayor is confident that by October 1, when the police begin their efforts to give the city a month of noiseless nights the educational phase of the drive will have made their work comparatively light.

Teachers Plan At Oxford How To Use Cinema

seen each other.

Dr. N. Gangulee, of the University of Calcutta, blamed producers for much of the lack of cooperation in film exchange. Producers, he said, have not learned that the display of films crudely depicting exaggerated national characteristics hurt the sensibilities and sometimes lead to national retaliation. Much might be done he said, by surveys which establish the extent to which authentic films might be used for drawing together the peoples of the East and West.

Such films should be carefully scrutinized said M. Lebrun of the French Ministry of Education and then placed upon an international catalogue. He drew attention to the opssibility for good will which would be opened if an international catalogue of cultural films were in existence.

Warning of Sound Films

But films, whether used on behalf of children or of adults, should always be employed with caution according to general opinion. They should never be sound films or talking films unless their aim is definitely that of the presentation of a complete and integral vision purposely coupled with words and sounds. Without this special aim in view words which issue from a machine are always inferior to words which come from the lips of a teacher. The personal, human element is lacking, and the effect falls proportionately short of the desired goal.

It was made clear that films should never be allowed to "lead to the passive absorption on the part of the child of a rapid and confused succession of images." Education, it was pointed out, is becoming more and more engaged in the effort of producing "brains that can think for themselves" rather than those capable merely of assimilating facts thought out for them by others.

The child thought should be stimulated to active observation and interest, never overwhelmed; never crushed beneath a weight so heavy as to deprive it of its natural freedom and buoyancy. Users of the cinema should have this fact constantly before them if the cinema is to fulfil its highest function.

44 Years With Pins In Mouth

The strange habits of Julius Piezzi, of Yolo County, California, started when he was a 10-year-old boy in my home town, Santa Rome. He suffered with a bad tooth and found he was relieved only when it was picked with a pin. Then he started carrying the pin in his mouth just to have it handy. He added more pins as the habit grew, and for the last 44 years he has carried from 5 to 125 pins in his mouth, day and night. He also carries a great pocketfull of knives—never less than 10—each of which he believes to be a good luck charm.

Paradox Of The Balloons

Take two toy balloons, inflate one to full size and the other to about quarter size. Connect them by a tube, and you will find that the air from the smaller will flow into the larger balloon. The larger balloon has the thinnest rubber surface, consequently it is weakest and the pressure within is less. try it some time.

Belgians Move Whole Tribes In Congo-Land

Congo State. These groups of natives who wait and wait are interesting studies. Whether they have actual business or only the natural desire of the African to "come and see," the visitor is unable to detect.

To reach the Ituri country from Kenya one passes through beautiful scenery before reaching the Congo. Traditional Uganda left behind, the road climbs through rolling mountain pastures with enormous herds of long-horned cattle watched by wild herdsmen with spears.

These natives are very different from the sleek Buganda around Victoria Nyanza, and as Ruanda is just over the range, occasionally a Watossi is seen; one of the famous Hamitic race who inhabit that lovely country. These men are enormously tall, reddish-brown in color with aquiline features and hair dressed in three high cones.

Beautiful Vistas

At sunset, vistas of far blue country are seen under towering clouds from the road winding up the mountains. There rises from the valleys the rhythmic song of native girls swinging their hoes in perfect time to their native music.

Up the Kabale escarpment the road—a great piece of engineering—winds round and above Lake Bunyoni which lies like a cup in the mountains. One view after another unfolds, until after passing the bamboo forests which are the home of the giant gorilla, one finds the rest house at the summit and sees the great volcanoes 13,000 and 14,000 feet that lie between Uganda and Lake Kivu. A strange, unearthly region—like the craters of the moon.

At the foot of the escarpment a single white-painted rail marks the entrance to the Congo. Beyond Rutshuru, the Belgian customs post, lies the Parc Albert. Here a lion slinks into roadside grass, water bucks obstruct the path of the car, and great herds of gazelle and antelope feed close to the road. In this famous game reserve no one may carry a gun, and no one can enter without a permit.

Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Phelps

American Who Fought With Japan Going Home After 33 Years Here

His service with the Japanese army in Manchuria during the Russo-Japanese war gave Mr. G. S. Phelps an insight on the character and problems of Japanese that has illuminated his 33 years here.

This, he said, looking back on his life here, has been the whole of his adult years. With Mrs. Phelps, he will sail Friday on the President Hoover to make his permanent home in the United States. "To get reacquainted with our country," Mr. Phelps remarked.

When their diplomas from the University of Minnesota were still so new what they probably liked to take them out and look at them, Mr. and Mrs. Phelps sailed on their honeymoon to Japan, arriving in 1902 and going immediately to Kyoto where he was honorary secretary of the Y.M.C.A.

"We were just two fresh and ignorant youngsters," Mr. Phelps recalled. He described the Japan he and his wife found by a word picture of students in Kyoto. Instead of overcoats, some of them wore red blankets!

Mr. Phelps had just time enough to learn a little of the language and to get settled when the Russo-Japanese war came along. He joined with the Y.M.C.A. forces and saw actual conflict under Marshal Oyama. He was in Manchuria, on the front, when the armistice was signed. This experience shed a light on the intimate spiritual and material lives of the soldiers and of the manhood of Japan that has given Mr. Phelps a kindly and sympathetic understanding of more recent events.

Mr. Phelps considered it a privilege to have seen during his life's span the development of the new Japan. Characteristically, he preferred to speak of the present and the future. He is and always has been more interested in people and, weighing progress, he saw it in terms of men rather than buildings. He said:

"I have great faith in Japan, based on experiences and observations. I firmly believe that Japan has progressed further along material lines in the last generation than any other people. Her standard of living has been raised. When we arrived, the university students were wearing red blankets for overcoats. Now look at their trim uniforms and spiffy hats. When we arrived, the country people were, to a wide extent, wearing the aka-getta which literally means red blanket.

"Japan has also forged ahead in intellectual lines. Her scientific progress has been tremendous. Her scholars are attending and contributing to scientific conferences throughout the world.

"It is remarkable the number of inventions which Japan has brought out in the last 10 years. It has been said that Japan is not inventive but purely imitative. When we arrived, we were amazed at the inventions she had made in her own realm, inventions that the West knew nothing about. Today Japan in sharing the common stream of life, is taking out, just as we are, the things she needs but also contributing to it.

"In has been a joy to me to see the increase in the freedom of women that has developed in Japan in the last 33 years. The school girls register in their faces a new activity and a new freedom of spirit as well as the sweetness which I think is quite characteristic. Both boys and girls have increased* in stature, a result of the higher standard of living.

"I am much impressed by the evidences of spiritual resources in Japan. Manifestation of these resources are not as apparent as industrial gain; they never are. We must judge from the mass reaction. Personally I feel that we have an amazing evidence of national consciousness which is essentially spiritual."

Mr. and Mrs. Phelps' three children were born in Kyoto where they lived until 1915 when he was transferred to Tokyo as the honorary secretary of the Y.M.C.A. National Council.

Mr. Phelps is ex-secretary of the Japan Chapter of the Red Cross which in 1917 and 1918 organized the American Red Cross expedition in Siberia. With the late Dr. Rudolph B. Teusler and Mr. Everett Frazar, he went to Siberia and opened hospitalization services for World war refugees, did civilian relief work, organized work for prisoners of war, and opened concentration camps in which were great numbers of Armenians who had fled from unbearable conditions in their land.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Phelps have been leaders in social life of Tokyo, contributing equally to Japanese and international circles and to organizations which include both. Mr. Phelps is a member of more than a score of organizations among which are the Japan-America society of which he has been an executive member, the American Association of which he is a past president, the National Christian Council of which he is a former committee member, the Federation of Christian Missions of which he was last year chairman, the Asiatic Society, and the Japan Alpine club.

Mrs. Phelps is a former vice president of the Phi Beta Kappa society here, former president of the Tokyo Women's club, member of the National Committee of the Y.W.C.A., and a former president of the American Association of University Women.

This week there are and have been many social functions honoring Mr. ad Mrs. Phelps. These indicate, in a small way, the esteem and love which the community has for them and the regret that is felt as their sailing day draws near.

Tuesday afternoon the Minister of Education gave a reception for Mr. Phelps at his official residence while at the same time Phi Beta Kappa was holding a reception for Mrs. Phelps at the Imperial hotel.

Today the Society for the Study of American-Japanese relations, under the leadership of Baron Sakatani and Viscount Ishii, held a luncheon for Mr. Phelps at the Bankers club.

Thursday noon, Baron Morimura will give a farewell luncheon for both Mr. and Mrs. Phelps and that afternoon from 4 to 7 p.m., Mr. and Mrs. Russell L. Durgin and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Jorgensen are entertaining in their honor at the Jorgensen home.

Mr. and Mrs. Phelps will leave Tokyo at 11:22 a.m. Friday from the Tokyo station via the Yokosuka express and undoubtedly many will meet at the station to accompany them to their boat which sails at 6 p.m.

They will make their home in Hartford, Conn., which is the home of their son, Mr. S. W. Phelps and the four-months-old grandson they have never seen. They are looking forward to Thanksgiving time when their family will be reunited for the first time in five years. Their two daughters, Theodosia who was graduated from Mt. Holyoke College last June and Mirian who recently opened a book shop in Cambridge, Mass., will both be home at that time.

Regret which Mr. and Mrs. Phelps naturally feel at their departure and which is evidenced by hundreds of their friends is lightened somewhat by their promise and expectation of a return visit to Japan.

Shinto Only Religion Intact If Science Discovers Way To Make Life Continuous, Declares Mason

Scientists may eventually find a way to make life continuous. When they do this, all the religions of the world will have to be scrapped or greatly modified—that is all except Shintoism.

Such is the view expressed by Mr. J. W. T. Mason, Shinto scholar, who has returned with Mrs. Mason from a lecture tour in the United States ad Europe. They will live at the Imperial hotel when not making tours to parts of the country outside Tokyo.

Mr. Mason has been studying Shintoism for 25 years, long before he ever came to Japan. He was here from 1932 to 1934 and his book on Shintoism was published here.

Mr. Mason contended that one cannot understand Japan unless one understands Shintoism. "The foreigners living here," he emphasized, "do not understand Japan. Japanese are a silent people. They speak in action rather than words. You must understand Shintoism to understand them."

He said that Shintoism is the creative force in Japan, that one can be a Shintoist and a Christian or a Buddhist at the same time, and that he is a Shintoist and a Christian.

Explaining why Shintoism can be the only religion intact if and when science finds a way to make life continuous, he said that Shintoism concerns itself with the present life and making the best of it. Hell and future life are left out of it.

In America and Europe he found a wide interest in Shintoism which he said reflects a return to fundamentals. Religions, he said, are getting away from the orthodox and returning to fundamentals. One of his lectures was before a large group of Presbyterian ministers who, after he spoke, asked many questions.

He said he first became interested in Shintoism because it was so fundamentally creative. He used to be a newspaper man.

Mr. and Mrs. Mason will be in Japan two or three years.

they prefer and live happily ever afterwards.

"Romance in Manhattan" with Francis Lederer and Ginger Rogers

From RKO-Radio comes "Romance in Manhattan" which is released at the Hibiya Gekijo (September 11-17).

Attention to the most minute detail in settings has given audiences an intriguing, intimate picture of the sub-stratum activity of New York City, with dramatic glimpses of Ellis Island, night police court and the steerage sections of a great ocean liner in "Romance in Manhattan", starring Francis Lederer and Ginger Rogers.

The early scenes are laid in the crowded, waterfront sections of Manhattan and the speeding, screaming, clanging, motor-choked streets are so faithfully reproduced that a native New Yorker would get a real pang of homesickness at seeing them. The streets were built full size at the RKO-Radio ranch. The motor traffic drove just as it does in those crowded districts, and Francis Lederer, hero of the photoplay, fought his way through it just as the immigrant boy he impersonatesd would have had to have done.

In the scenes in the tenement flat, every last detail is true to life. The carpet in the hallways is faded and ragged in spots. The globes on the lights are not overly clean, the view from the windows discloses rows of clothespoles, telegraph wire, and the usual littered backyards of the crowded sections.

It is interesting to know that the backings of exteriors used in the studio settings are not painted scenery, but actual photographs enlarged to almost life size and reproduced on canvas.

He has also done a series of portraits of South Sea youths, into the designs of which he has painted the gorgeous insects of the islands. In still another series Mr. Jacoulet has decorated the backgrounds of his portraits with exoxtic butterflies.

In addition he has painted several new studies of geisha, dancers, and a striking portrait of a Gidayu Joruri minstrel.

The latest print to be issued in the Jacoulet collection is a study of Korean youths outside a cinema. The next one which is soon to be published is "Ponape Girl in a Shower," and the October print which will please collectors of Jacoulet prints is "A Girl of Palos," with a gorgeous background of orchids.

England To Plan Straighter Roads In Next 5 Years

Winding Lanes Of Britain To Have Bends Taken Out Of Them

The winding lanes of Britain are to have some of their bends taken out of them.

In five years' time the Ministry of Transport declares that the road system of Britain will have been completely transformed, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. Leslie Hore-Belisha, tireless Minister of Transport, intends to make British roads as safe and as straight as any in the world. Under the ministry's new five-year plan most of the main roads will soon be of the dual carriage-way type, a strip of grass dividing the opposite streams of traffic: "fly-over" bridges, similar to those on British railways, will be erected at many crossroads and at railway crossings; blind corners will be removed; weak bridges will be reconstructed.

Co-operation Invited

The first step toward the application of the plan has already been made. Mr. Hore-Belisha has invited all highway authorities to submit at once the schemes with which they are prepared to proceed immediately and further installments of their plans as soon as they can.

This vast road reconstruction will be effected by co-operation between the Ministry of Transport and the local highway authorities in town and country districts.

The Ministry will supervise all plans and the Ministry's experts will be available for consultative work. But the local authorities will be able to implement scheme of their own and to deal with their own problems in much their own way.

The Transport Ministry is to grant 60 per cent of the cost of approved major reconstructions from the Road Fund.

One of the greatest concerns of the new five-year plan for the roads is to avoid the dangers of "ribbon development." This is caused by builders buying land alongside new highways and erecting long straggling towns directly beside roads which have been built with the intention of avoiding populated areas. Highway authorities are to co-operate with town-planning authorities to avoid ribbon development in the future.

To Strengthen Bridges

Mr. Hore-Belisha believes that one of the most pressing problems is that of the numerous weak bridges.

These bridges are to be tackled first by local authorities. The Minister of Transport has already issued instructions to divisional road engineers that all approved schemes of reconstruction of weak or inadequate bridges will be accepted for grants at the appropriate rate if it can be shown that the schemes will be commenced during the financial year 1935-36.

"Henceforth," Mr. Hore-Belisha declared, when speaking of the five-year road plan recently, "highway authorities will be able to lay their plans in the knowledge that a comprehensive view will be taken of their requirements and that their projects are not likely to suffer from the disabilities inseparable from a hand-to-mouth policy, with all the uncertainty which that entails."

"Our five-year program," he added, "will make provision for the improvements which highway authorities, thinking ahead and arranging ahead, can reasonably be expected to carry out in the period."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Monument To A City

Gatton, on the Pilgrim Way between London and Brighton, was once a large and important city. Later, it deteriorated and became famous as a "rotten borough," continuing to return two members to Parliament until the Reform of 1832. Now all that is left of the large town is a derelict portico of the Town Hall.

Congress Newspaper Calls For End Of Long Controversy Under Linlithgow

The news of the Marquess of Linlithgow's appointment as Viceroy had a friendly reception throughout India even from India Congress newspapers, which admit "a worse choice could have been made."

The Viceroy will arrive in India to find it in a state of political transition unparalleled in the political experience of the country, Indian opinion continues hostile to the new Constitution, although the voice of extreme critics has been tempered since the India Bill became a law, which the existing Legislature will have a say. Then he must 'negotiate intruments of accession with a number of princes and finally establish the complete scheme envisaged in the India Act. There is a general belief that all this will be accomplished during his five-year term of office.

Newspaper Urges Peace

One Congress newspaper said today:

"We wanted the constitutional changes to be as free as possible but now that the issue is closed let the dust of controversy subside and let men turn their attention to working out the Constitution which it is their privilege to have obtained by sacrifices of a decade."

"A realignment of political affiliations is proceeding throughout India. Even the Congress party is preparing to enter elections and may even form ministries in provinces where it obtains majorities.

The government that the Marquess of Linlithgow must inaugurate will completely transform politics and greatly alter the form of administration. He must establish eleven autonomous provinces and supervise the transitory centre in which the existing Legislature will have a say. Then he must 'negotiate intruments of accession with a number of princes and finally establish the complete scheme envisaged in the India Act. There is a general belief that all this will be accomplished during his five-year term of office.

Praised by Gandhi Aide

"The Marquess of Linlithgow is a good man who will always take a just view," said S. M. Birla, Indian business man and close friend of Mahatma Gandhi, in commenting on the Viceroy's appointment. "I know him personally and hope he will be able to create a better atmosphere in India."

The British press without exception wecomes the appointment. The Tory Morning Post, which fought the India bill, agrees with Liberal newspapers that the government has chosen wisely and well.

Australia Gets A New Governor

Sir Alexander Hore-Ruthven Is Named To Post By King George

Brig. Gen. Sir Alexander Hore-Ruthven, an Englishman, is to succeed Sir Isaac Alfred Isaacs, first native-born Governor General of the Commonwealth of Australia.

The appointment was made by King George on August 18 on the recommendation of Joseph Lyons, Prime Minister of Australia, and is a tribute to Sir Alexander's work in the Commonwealth first as military secretary to the Governor General in 1908, then as Governor of South Australia where a Laborite Government, instead of sending the Governor home as promised during the election campaign, extended his term of office, and subsequently as Governor of New South Wales, which office he holds at present.

The announcement of the appointment from Buckingham Palace said the date of his assumption of office would be set later, according to the New York Times.

Sir Isaac is in his eightieth year, and formerly was Australia's most brilliant advocate. The new appointee comes from a family that specializes in overseas government. His brother, Colonel Christian Hore-Ruthven has been an aide to the viceroys of India and Ireland and is now military secretary at Government House in Capetown, South Africa. Another brother, Lord Ruthven, was formerly Lieutenant Governor of Guernsey, one of the Channel Islands.

Began Military Career in 1891

Brigadier General Sir Alexander Gore Arkwright Hore-Ruthven, the new Governor General of Australia, was born at Windsor, England, on July 6, 1872, the second son of the eighth Lord Ruthven. He was educated at Eton and began his military career in 1891, when he joined the Third Battalion Highland Light Infantry.

In 1898 he was attached to the Egyptian Army of the Sudan, commanding the Camel Corps Detachment at the Battle of Gedaref, and subsequent operations, for which he received the Victoria Cross. He formerly served as military secretary to the Viceroy of Ireland and to the Governor General of Australia. Because of his service in France and Gallipoli in the World War he was decorated with the Distinguished Service Order, besides a number of British decorations and citations. He was married in 1908 to Zara, daughter of John Pollok of Lismany, County Galway, Ireland. The couple have one son.

100-Mile Suez Canal Focus Of World Attention

Waterway Is Link Pin Connecting Trade Routes Of Eastern Hemisphere

WASHINGTON D. C. — Slicing through the narrow peninsula that links Africa and Asia, a short cut to the Orient that has made dreams of ancient conquerors come true, the Suez Canal is now a focus of world attention as Italian troops and munitions of war pour through it on the way to East Africa.

This 100-mile waterway, which enables ships to steam directly between the Mediterranean and Red Seas without making the tedious voyage around Africa, forms the link pin connecting the trade routes of the Eastern Hemisphere, says a bulletin from the Washington, D. C. headquarters of the National Geographic Society.

Saves Thousands of Miles

For ships of all European nations trading with the Orient and East Africa, the canal is a tremendous saver of time and distance. Typical comparative distances are:

From	To	Via Canal miles	Around Africa miles
London	Bombay	7,028	12,548
Hamburg	„	7,382	12,903
Trieste	„	4,816	13,229
London	Hongkong	11,112	15,229
Istanbul	Zanzibar (East Africa)	4,365	10,271

From a commercial standpoint, the Suez Canal is of greater importance to Great Britain than to any other nation. In 1933 more British ships passed through it than those of the next seven largest users of the canal combined, and the tonnage represented was in a similar proportion.

Egypt, through whose territory the canal runs, is an independent nation, although a garrison of about 12,000 British troops is stationed there and in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan to the south. Egypt was a British protectorate from 1914 to 1922. When her independence was recognized by Great Britain, it was agreed that Egyptian national defense should remain under British control.

Various international agreements have provided that the Suez Canal should remain open at all times to the vessels of all nations. During the World War, however, the canal was garrisoned by British and French military and naval forces and closed to ships of the Central powers, though it remained open to neutral shipping. In 1882, during a crisis in Egypt, the Canal was closed by British troops for four days.

Not Under Gov. Control

Unlike the Panama Canal, which is directly controlled by the United States Government, the Suez Canal is a private business concern. No nation has direct authority over it. The Canal is owned and operated by the Suez Canal Company (Compagnie Universelle du Canal Maritime de Suez), a French organization which holds a concession from the Egyptian Government expiring in 1968.

Fifty-two per cent of the shares in this company are held by French investors, 44 per cent by the British Government, and the remainder in other European countries. On the board of directors are 21 Frenchmen, 10 Englishmen, and one Dutchman. The British Government's shares originally were held by the Khedive of Egypt but were sold by him to England in 1875 for $20,000,000.

Builder of the Canal was Count Ferdinand de Lesseps of France, known also for the failure of the later attempt to build a canal at Panama in the 1880's. The Suez Canal, however, was a success once its sponsors had overcome diplomatic obstacles and early financial troubles. Strangely enough, de Lesseps' efforts to gain consent to the building of the Canal from the Sultan of Turkey, to whose empire Egypt then belonged, were opposed by the British Government.

Work on the Canal was begun in 1859 and it was opened to traffic ten years later with a lavish celebration given by the Egyptian Khedive and attended by the Empress Eugenine of France, the Emperor of Austria and other royal personages. In 1934 the Canal was used by 5,663 vessels. This compares with 5,533 ships whih used the Panama Canal during the fiscal year ending in June, 1934.

Canal Has No Locks

Unlike the Panama waterway, the Suez Canal has no locks and is built at sea level. At the Mediterranean end is Port Said, named for Said Pasha, Egyptian Viceroy when the Canal was built. The city stands on a low, sandy coast; its harbor made muddy by waters of an arm of the Nile which reaches the sea nearby.

From the smaller city of Suez, at the Canal's southern end, can be seen the mountains of the Sinai Peninsula, one of which is said to be the Mt. Sinai of the Bible. Some believe that the crossing of the Red Sea by the Children of Israel may have taken place near the southern end of what is now the Canal, when the Red Sea extended farther inland.

From the dawn of history traders and soldiers alike have dreamed of a water route across the Isthmus of Suez. The Egyptians, from 1350 to 1300 B. C. dug a canal which joined the Nile River with the Red Sea by way of Lake Timsah. Eventually this became choked with sand, but another canal was begun about 600 B. C., again joining the Red Sea and the Nile.

This remained navigable until the time of the Battle of Actium in 31 B. C., when it is said that some of Queen Cleopatra's ships escaped by it to the Red Sea after their defeat by the Romans. Later the route was restored twice, once by the Roman Emperor Trajan and again in the 7th century A. D. by Amru, Islamic conqueror of Egypt."

Hurley, Tumulty Received Big Fees From US Utilities

Patrick J. Hurley and Joseph P. Tumulty, both former high United States government officials, received a total of $209,009 in the last few years for representing various clients in connection with legislation pending before Congress, the Senate Lobby Committee brought out in Washington, D. C., on August 7.

Mr. Hurley, President Hoover's Secretary of War, said he received $100,000 from the Associated Gas and Electric Company for his activities in connection with the Holding Company Bill, and Mr. Tumulty, President Wilson's secretary, received $109,000 for representing clients, including public utilities, according to the New York Times.

Mr. Tumulty was a willing and ingratiating witness, who freely testified to all his dealings with the companies he represented, and stated that in all cases he had strongly argued against lobbying or any practice other than open and co-operative dealing with members of Congress in investigations and in legislation.

He brought with him a printed statement of his position containing extracts from many letters to his clients, but under the committee's policy Chairman Black refused to place it in evidence.

Mr. Hurley, on the other hand, fought the committee bitterly from the start, resisted efforts to get him to state the amount of his fees and asserted that Democrats were not being investigated, and that he was being singled out for persecution as a Republican lawyer.

Oriental Institute Is Established At U. Of Hawaii

Aim Is To Consolidate Work In Courses Given On Far Eastern Subjects

The University of Hawaii in Honolulu, which has long been concerned with interpreting the Far East to America, recently announced the establishment of the Oriental Institute as a new department of the university.

The purposes of the new institute will be to consolidate the work in Oriental culture, language, history and government now conducted by several departments, to add undergraduate and graduate courses in Far Eastern subjects, to establish exchange professorships and student scholarships with universities in Asia, to promote research, to built up the library collection of books on Japan, China, Russia and India, and to encourage translations of outstanding works of Oriental literature.

It will attempt to interpret to Americans the culture of the Far East, to promote international friendship, and to establish a study center between two civilizations to which students from either may come.

Oriental Languages

It is felt that mainland students can come here to advantage because of the large number of courses in Oriental languages and because of the opportunities for friendships with large numbers of university students of Oriental descent. Students from Japan and China will also be welcomed. Since both Western and Eastern languages are spoken by members of the faculty and student body, it is believed that students from these countries will find adjustment easier than in other American universities.

Prof. Gregg M. Sinclair, for six years a teacher of English in Kyoto and Hikone, will be head of the Institute. With B. Misui, Professor Sinclair translated "An Adopted Husband" from the Japanese. He is co-translator with J. K. Suita of "Tokyo Stories." With Helen Gay Pratt of Honolulu and Dr. Masamichi Royama of Tokyo Imperial University, he is author of a study unit on Japan now used in the public schools of Hawaii. He is also editor of "Ten Stories by Henry James," and member of a number of literary and Oriental societies, including the Asiatic Society of Japan. Adviser of the Oriental Literary society of the university, Professor Sinclair has taught courses and lectured on Japanese and Chinese literature in Honolulu for the last seven years.

Becoming Widely Known

The University of Hawaii is rapidly becoming known throughout the United States for its interracial, anthropological, psychological and sociological studies. Three years ago the School of Pacific and Oriental Affairs was established as a part of its summer session. Among prominent Japanese educators who have served on the faculty of the Honolulu university are Dr. Tasuku Harada, former president of Doshisha University, Dr. Rokuro Nakaseko of Doshisha, Dr. Masamichi Royama of Tokyo Imperial University, Dr. Kokichi Morimoto of Hokkaido Imperial University, and M. Yanagi, prominent artist.

In an article published in the Atlantic Monthly for June, Edwin R. Embree, president of the Rosenwald Fund, declared "The University of Hawaii offers a stirring education in world citizenship obtainable nowhere else."

The Closed Gate of Traquair

The Castle of Traquair, situated one half mile south of Innerleithen, Scotland, is an ancient baronial mansion which from time immemorial housed the ancient Scottish Kings. In 1745 Charles Edward Stuart, (Bonnie Prince Charlie) the Young Pretender, passed here on his way to England. As soon as the Bonnie Prince left, the Earl of Traquair ordered the gates of the Castle closed, vowing that they would not be opened again, until a Stuart will again sit on the British throne. The Stuart forces were defeated shortly after, and the Bonnie Prince had to flee to France. But Traquair kept the vow, and the gates of the castle have remained closed to the present day, an interval of 190 years.

Find Ancient City In North Syria

Important Syrian-Hittite Capital Of 1000 To 500 B.C. Is Indicated By Ruins

Discovery of an ancient city-site in North Syria, believed to have been a local capital of considerable importance in the Syrian-Hittite world about the period 1000 B. C. to 500 B. C., was announced on August 18 by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago.

The discovery was reported by Dr. C. W. McEwan, field director of the institute's Syrian expedition, who recently returned to this country. Trial excavation has uncovered a royal palace and has given indication that there are other public buildings on the site, according to the New York Times. One of the finest examples of Hittite art yet found, a double-lion column base, has already been unearthed.

Dr. McEwan, whose expedition has been excavating two ancient mounds about midway between Alexandretta and Aleppo in North Syria, in his report related the circumstances of the discovery of this third mound in the district.

"The native foreman of the expedition was going to Antioch on his bicycle one day last season when he noticed two carefully cut blocks of basalt in the deep ditch beside the highway," Dr. McEwan reports. "They were on the edge of a long, low lying mound called Tell Tainat. The foreman was experienced enough in antiquity hunting to recognize them as important clues.

"When the members of the expedition investigated the mound they found huge column bases of a type characteristic of royal buildings of the late Hittite period—after 1000 B. C. The natives of a little village near by had been digging into the mound, not for antiquities, but for ancient burned brick to fill depressions in road building.

"These clues were so striking that they demanded further investigation. In the late Spring the Oriental Institute therefore undertook a two-week dig at Tell Tainat, in cooperation with the Department of Antiquities of the District of Alexandretta, which was represented by M. Claude Prost. The trial excavation proved very successful, uncovering a 'hilani' or Syrian-Hittite palace, which showed three constrution periods, ranging from 850 B. C. to 600 B. C. There is promise of further buildings for future work.

"The Syrian-Hittite culture was a composite of Hittite, Aramaican, Phoenician and Assyrian elements, flourishing in North Syria from about 1100 B. C. to the conquest of Alexander the Great. The discovery of a local capital of this people will bring new light to bear on a most interesting period. The Oriental Institute hopes to return to this site in the Autumn for further excavation of the mound.

"The most striking single find in the palace was a double-lion column base, two crouching lions whose backs supported a column at the entrance to the palace. While column bases of one kind or another are, of course, common in archaeological excavation, this is the first object of its kind found in this civilization, and it has been pronounced one of the finest specimens of Hittite art yet recovered."

Sai Shoki

Korean Dancer Is Making Film Based Upon Her Own Life

Miss Sai Shoki Postpones Her Recital Scheduled For Oct. 22

The recital which Miss Sai Shoki, noted Korean dancer, was to give at the Hibiya public hall on October 22, has been postponed.

This is an announcement to be met with regret by everyone except Miss Sai herself. She is the dancer who won wide praise from the foreign colony in Tokyo when she gave three Korean dances at the benefit program for the Japan Humane Society last winter in the little theater of Takarazuka. Since then the public has been looking forward to Miss Sai's own recital.

The long promised entertainment has been postponed for Miss Sai is leaving for Korea, her home, where she will star in a motion picture based on the story of her own life! She will begin work on the production set next week. This will be her first leading role in the cinema but those who have noted the drama with which she endows her dances will agree that she is almost as much actress as dancer.

Miss Sai came to Tokyo from her native Korea and studied dancing under Baku Ishii, leading exponent of the modern dance school. Later, desiring to be independent, she opened her own dance studio. She is ambitious to take Korean dances to the New York stage but she doesn't believe that she herself is ready for New York at this time. After another year of study, she may venture west.

President Asks Quick Work On Youth Program

Tells State Directors They Must Cut Red Tape And Get Busy

State directors of the National Youth Administration were on their way home on August 21 with instructions from President Roosevelt for "action" in the $50,000,000 program to help the young people of the nation.

Shortly before they closed their two-day session in Washington, D. C., on August 20, the program directors visited the President in his office and heard him define the purpose of the NYA—to secure for 2,000,000 young people in families on relief "the opportunity to share equally with their fellows the normal blessings of our traditional American life," according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Mrs. Roosevelt Urges Action

At a luncheon, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, urged speedy cutting of red tape to get the various sections of the school and job program under way.

"We have been looking forward to the initiation of this youth program for a great many years," the President told the directors. "In previous days groups came down here to talk about education, child welfare and various things like that. They bad very interesting discussions and they passed very nice resolutions. Later the whole proceedings were bound up and distributed around the country. Everybody went home and little, if anything, resulted from these efforts."

Says He Will Make Action

Although he did not make his point any more specific, the President left little doubt that he was referring to the White House conference on child health and child welfare, held under the Hoover regime.

"Our procedure," he went on, "is different. We have asked you here to start something. We have given you $50,000,000. It is the first time the Federal Government has attempted a great national project of this kind. It is an experiment, but we are going to get action, something more than mere resolutions, out of it."

Time to Act Is Now

Mr. Roosevelt made it clear that next year there may not be as much relief money available as this, and that whether Congress continues the youth program depends upon what is accomplished this first year with relief funds. "Therefore," he told the directors, "you have a very great responsibility."

The President said that "primarily we have to recognize that the work this year is for the benefit of the young people of the families now on relief but, in a larger sense, it includes, through the effect it will have, all young people, in every part of the nation."

According to Mr. Roosevelt's figures, 1,700,000 young people are on relief in urban areas and 1,200,000 in rural areas. Less than one half of these young people, he estimated, have reached or gone beyond the eighth grade.

Not for Privileged Few

At the luncheon, Mr. Hopkins warned the directors that the success of the whole program will hinge on the use of imagination to obtain projects suitable to each community. State directors are to be given real freedom of action, he said. He told them that "in the main, you will be dealing with the 25 per cent of Americans who are on the bottom of the economic heap," and that "the Government of the United States intends to provide security for all, not just for a privileged few."

Mrs. Roosevelt, returning to the capital to make her first speech since mid-June, said she thought it was probably better to get something accomplished than to obey every government rule. She urged that every available source in communities be utilized in the youth program and that advice and inspiration be furnished well-to-do youth as well as those in need of financial aid.

British Demand Closer Control Of Radio Humor manuscript, exactly as the manuscript has been passed, is very strictly kept.

On rare occasions radio personalities of note and public figures have been allowed to radiocast without manuscripts, or with manuscripts that have not been officially passed in their entirety. But generally the talk must be given as written.

Advertising Censored

With regard to advertising over the air new rules have also been circulated to variety artists.

In recent months numerous instances have been brought to the notice of the B. B. C. when variety artists have openly advertised the shows they are to appear in or are appearing in, and have exhorted listeners to go to a theater they have named.

Now artists are reminded that they must not mention during their radiocasts the name of any production in which they are appearing or the name of the theater or the name of the management to which they are under contract.

Another change is expected. Up to now the B. B. C. has not been an advertiser itself. But in advertising circles it is being asked why Sir Stephen Tallents, former Post Office publicity expert, has been chosen as the new Public Relations Officer to the B. B. C. The answer given is that it is expected that the Broadcasting Corporation is now to start a campaign to make the public more appreciative of the good point of the radio service in Britain.

U.S. Studying Naval Asset In Aleutian Isles

With Hawaii It Makes A Vise Of Pacific Area, Excelling Philippines For Defense

Unofficial observers of naval policy are convinced that as soon as the lapse of the Washington Treaty on Dec. 31, 1936, makes possible, the United States will proceed to the construction of a naval base in the Aleutian Islands. Already, Claude A. Swanson, Secretary of the Navy, has indicated that the possibility is under study, says the Washington correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

But competent authorities feel that, despite difficulties, the Aleutians for the defense of the United States offer a strategical substitute for the Philippines without any of those islands' disadvantages.

Indeed, other considerations apart, the Philippines have always been recognized by naval authorities as a strategical burden rather than advantage, says the article which continues:

Of Great Strategic Value

On the Aleutians, stretching like the long tail of a kite 1500 miles out in the Pacific, there are harbors, and despite a miserable climate, the islands hold great possibilities for seaplane and naval action, cutting directly athwart the best routes by sea or air across the Pacific.

Hence, great interest was aroused when about two thirds of the islands, from the 167th meridian eastward, were this week converted into a militarized zone over which the flying of civil aircraft is forbidden. President Roosevelt stated at his press conference that the decision spoke for itself.

New Key to Defenses

But as the naval treaty structure appears to disintegrate, and as the "pressure policy" in the Pacific, both on sea and in the air, intensifies, observers feel that the Aleutians along with Hawaii hold a vital and powerful key to American defenses.

This year's naval maneuvers were held on the great triangle made by the Aleutians, Hawaii, and Puget Sound. This area obviously dominates American defense on the West. Already the Pacific coast area is strongly defended, with Mare Island in the South and Puget Sound in the North, the fortresses focusing offshore.

Hawaii a First Line

Hawaii, with powerful naval and air bases, and a veritable powder magazine of munitions and supply, is already, before Philippine independence, the first real stage of defense. For the Philippines are so vulnerable to attack, bottled up in an ocean dominated by other powers in every quarter, that they can scarcely be spoken of in the defensive sense.

But Hawaii is isolated, and can easily be sidetracked by all fleets which would choose the northern circle route—the route followed by many express steamers—which leaves them far to the south and approaches the southern shores of the Aleutians.

Of Particular Naval Value

Here those desolate, almost deserted, fog-swept and chilly islands become the prime defensive factor. Their naval importance is regarded as even greater than their air possibilities at present, but the range of aircraft and piloting is constantly extending.

Nearly all the islands are deeply indented, and provide sheltered coves, land-locked harbors, or lakes every few miles, points out the National Geographic Society. Seaplanes would find them easy to land upon, although the fog factor is an ever-present difficulty.

Not Cold, but Raw and Wet

The islands are not cold, like Canada or parts of Alaska, but always chilly, damp, and foggy, the society continues, in a report released recently. The best harbor is at Dutch Harbor, barely to the east of the 167th meridian, where the military zone begins. Dutch Harbor was left out, although it is the most-used naval zone, apparently to stimulate access to it from the American mainland, yet to prevent access from the Asiatic side.

Temperatures at Dutch Harbor average 39 degrees, with a low of 30 above zero in January and a high of 52 in July. The annual fainfall is 63 inches, and many days in the year are rainy.

Water supply, however, is limited because there are no great watersheds or rivers. Vegetables can only be grown under glass, there is no wood on the islands, and the natives use driftwood and animal oils for heat.

Since gales lash the coast, anchorage is difficult, unless a suitable harbor has been found. Conical volcanic peaks stud the islands. Between 1900 and 1907 the most famous volcano, Bogoslof, played tricks with explorers, because eruptions caused islands and peaks to appear and disappear in baffling fashion.

Dutch Harbor, a third of the way out from Alaska proper, is one of the finest anchorages in the North, and was much used as a way station during the Alaskan gold rushes. It has a radio station. Atka, several hundred miles further west and in the middle of the forbidden zone, is halfway out and has one of the last settlements. Its harbor, Hazan Bay, is often clear of fog when it hovers outside.

From Atka for a sweep of 500 miles the islands are practically uninhabited. At last is Attu, the westernmost bit of land connected with the American Continent on which the Stars and Stripes wave.

It is beyond the 180th degree of latitude, but the international date line bulges around it to keep the islands in the same day.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Only Marine

George LaBlanche, not Gene Tunney, was the only Marine to defeat Jack Dempsey for the world championship. He battled in San Francisco August 27, 1889.

LaBlanche came over from the Navy Yard at the Vallejo and knocked out the then middleweight champion Jack Dempsey, called the Non-Pareil. Dempsey was winning easily until the 32nd round when La Blanche lashed out with a back-hand or pivot blow which caught Dempsey on the chin and knocked him cold.

The pivot blow was afterwards declared illegal.

Soviets Exact New Discipline Of Young Reds

'Home,' 'Mother,' 'Family' Again Good Words In Russian Lexicon

Soviet Russia's young people, who have been encouraged to take a precociously active part in the affairs of state for 17 years, are definitely set back in a subordinate position by a degree which drastically reorganizes the Young Communist League—Komsomol—with its 5,000,000, members, the spearhead of the youth movement in Russia, says the Christian Science Monitor correspondent of Moscow.

In announcing the reorganization, the plenum of the League pointed out that the Komsomol has become a sort of miniature Communist Party, assuming tasks beyond the strength of immature youth, with the result that proper education of young people has been neglected. The League is ordered to abandon all other tasks and concentrate upon disciplined education of its members and of all Soviet youth.

The official press comments editorially that a new phase has been reached in Soviet Russia's evolution. Until now, Russia has had to use half-trained young people in the swift process of industrialization, in collectivizing agriculture, in building a vast bureaucracy for state enterprises. But now it is possible to turn attention toward developing disciplined and fully trained young men and women. The Young Communist League must lead in this task, which requires all its energy.

Enthusiastic Disciples

The Bolshevik program aroused immense enthusiasm in the younger generation, who accepted more whole-heartedly than their elders the revolutionary social and economic changes. Bolshevik scorn for tradition and religion, which antagonized a large part of the older generation, was less disturbing to young people, who played a major part in the cruel "class warfare" which raged in town and village. Without the support of young people, it is doubtful if the Bolshevik regime could have survived.

Bolshevik leaders understood this fully. They encouraged children to defy their teachers and parents, praised children who denounced their parents to the political police, told young people that they owed allegiance only to the state. They cleverly utilized young people to break up all political opposition and to smash all old institutions.

But in the process the sense of discipline was largely lost, and young men and women acquired an immense sense of their own importance. When the state turned from destruction to reconstruction, and began to erect in earnest its vast centralized industrial and agricultural system, the disadvantages of undisciplined youth became apparent.

Discipline Sought

For several years the Bolsheviks have been endeavoring to turn back their young people into disciplined lines. Teachers were given back their authority in 1932, and school discipline has since been rapidly strengthened and severely enforced. But only this spring did the Bolsheviks restore completely the authority of parents, and rediscover the primary importance of united families.

"Home" and "mother" and "family" have suddenly become precious words again in Soviet Russia. Decrees passed this summer make parents and guardians more responsible for conduct of children than in most other countries. The official Komsomol newspaper recently wrote indignantly: "We stigmatize the behavior of young men and women who are rude to their parents, who feel like outsiders in their own families. Respect for the senior generation, loving regard for parents, is a basic principle of Communist morality which the Komsomol must inculcate." Such sentiments would have been "heresy" in Russia a few years ago.

Reorganization of the Young Communist League completes the process of putting Soviet youth in its place. The full strength of this poewrful youth organization is being turned to disciplining its own members, and in instructing them how to discipline the rest of Soviet young people. The "new" ideas of home and family and youthful discipline, familiar enough elsewhere, are the center of the educational program which is announced as the sole task of the Youth League.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Road to Ruin

The Chinese Eastern Railway, 1,600 miles long, built by Russia across Manchuria to connect Siberia with Vladivostock across Chinese territory, cost the Russian Government 400,000,000 gold rubles ($200,000,000 at the old parity.)

When the railroad was first built, the unprecedented high pay to Chinese laborers (1½ cents a day), attracted so many coolies and brought such a ferment into the Chinese Empire, that it caused its overthrow. It also brought Russia into conflict with Japan. The Russo-Japanese War of 1904, in which Russia was defeated, weakened the Czar's throne until it was unable to resist the Red Revolution a decade later. While it brought disaster to two empires, the railroad advanced a third empire; Japan, to the status of a world power.

The Chinese Eastern Railway has recently been sold to Manchoukuo for ¥120,000,000 ($35,000,000).

Yukon Peak Scaled For The First Time

Wood Expedition Ascends Mt. Steele In Hazardous Trip Never Tried Before

A nineteen-word message, carried out of a barren and mountainous region of the Yukon Territory in Northwestern Canada, five days on horseback to Burwash Landing, radioed to Whitehorse and finally telegraphed to the American Geographical Society of New York brought word on August 26 that Walter A. Wood Jr. and three companions had successfully scaled the peak of Mount Steele, one of the highest and most inaccessible mountains in the Northwest.

Laden with snow and glacial ice, surrounded by lesser peaks about which nothing is known, swept by icy winds, Mount Steele's 16,439-feet of treacherous slopes rise in a virtually unexplored region just east of the Alaskan boundary and north of the 62d Parallel, North Latitude.

One of a group of impressive peaks lying some thirty miles to the north of Mount Logan, 11,850 feet, the second highest on the North American Continent, Mount Steele has never before been attempted, even by veteran climbers because nothing was known of its character, the qualities of its snow and glacial ice, the probability of snowslides, nor the wind and other weather conditions at its summit, says the New York Times.

The ascent was made by Wood and his companions on Aug. 15, after only one previous attempt. Their objective was not simply the triumph of adventure, but an opportunity to take photographs of the surrounding peaks and general topography as an aid to the aerial protographic survey the expedition is conducting under the auspices of the American Geographical Society.

The telegram that brought the news was sent in duplicate, one copy to the society, and another to Mrs. Wood, who was herself a member of the expedition and left it only a few days ago to return to New York on business.

It was dated Burwash Landing, Aug. 24, and read:

"Report ascent of Mount Steele, Aug. 15, by Hans Joe Harrison, myself and safe return Burwash Landing.

WALTER WOOD."

The three companions referred to by their Christian names in the message are Hans Fuehrer, Joseph Fobes and Harrison Wood, brother of the expedition's leader.

Veteran Mountain Climber

Mr. Wood is a member of the research staff of the American Geographical Society, a post he has occupied for two years, although he had undertaken other assignments for the society during four previous years. He has had varied experiences both in mountain climbing and surveying in Switzerland, India and Central America, and was a member of the Louise Boyd expedition to East Greenland in 1933.

The ascent, which was made over the mountain's east slopes, was carried out only as a part of the broader expedition, which has had its base of operations on the upper end of Kluane Lake at the little town of Burwash Landing, a mixed colony inhabited by Indians and a handful of former prospectors.

The other four members of the Wood expedition, who divided the mechanical and technical preparations for the aerial survey, are I. Peace Hazard, Adeline Hazard, Mrs. Harrison Eustis and Mrs. Wood.

At the society headquarters, Broadway and 156th Street, recently Mrs. Wood and O. M. Miller, chief of the research department which arranged for the expedition, exchanged mutual speculations on the details of the ascent.

"I'm afraid the relief and the thrill were mixed with envy," said Mrs. Wood. "How I wish I were back up there now, skimming over those icy peaks in our shiny plane!"

Mrs. Wood was proud of the negatives she brought back, for they were the first ever taken of the peaks in that region.

The aim of the expedition, as it was outlined by Mr. Miller, has been to secure the best possible photographs of the hitherto uncharted region from the air as a preliminary to laboratory work of a radically new nature which is being developed by the society's research department.

communism involved in social security legislation, in bank deposit insurance, in farm credit, in the saving of homes, in the protection of investors and in the regulation of public utilities. The reforms, however, for which we were condemned twenty-four years ago, are taken today as a matter of course. And so, I believe, will be regarded the reforms that now cause such concern to the reactionaries of this year of 1935.

We come to an understanding of these new ways of protecting people because our knowledge enlarges and our capacity for organized action increase. People have learned that they can carry their burdens effectively only by cooperation. We have found out how to conquer the ravages of diseases that years ago were regarded as unavoidable and inevitable. We must learn that many other social ills can be cured.

Pictures New Individualism

Let me emphasize that, serious as have been the errors unrestrained individualism, I do not believe in abandoning the system of individual enterprise. The freedom, the opportunity that have characterized American development in the past can be maintained if we recognize the fact that the individual system of our day calls for the collaboration of all of us to provide, at the least, security for all of us. Those words "freedom" and "opportunity" do not mean a license to climb upward by pushing other people down.

Any paternalistic system that tries to provide for security for every one from above only calls for an impossible task and a regimentation utterly uncongenial to the spirit of our people. But government cooperation to help make the system of free enterprise work, to provide that minimum security without which the competitive system cannot function, to restrain the kind of individual action which in the past has been harmful to the community—that kind of governmental cooperation is entirely consistent with the best tradition of America.

Just as the evolution of economic and social life has shown the need for new methods and practices, so has the new political life developed the need for new political practices and methods. Government now demands the best trained brains of every business and profession. Government today requires higher and higher standards of those who would serve it. It must bring to its service greater and greater competence. The conditions of public work must be improved and protected. Mere party membership and loyalty can no longer be the exclusive test. We must be loyal not merely to persons or parties, but to the higher conceptions of ability and devotion that modern government requires.

Gloomy Problets in Every Age

There was a day when political sages, or those who controlled the political sages, took the attitude that anything new, or what they called "new-fangled," would lead to dire results. There is nothing new in those prophecies of gloom. I read these lines in a paper the other day—a little poem entitled Going to the Dogs!

My grandpa notes the world's worn cogs,
And says we're going to the dogs;
His granddad in his house of logs,
Swore things were going to the dogs;
His dad, among the Flemish bogs,
Vowed things were going to the dogs;
The caveman in his queer skin togs,
Said things were going to the dogs;
But this is what I wish to state—
The dogs have had an awful wait.

I would be lacking in any sense of responsibility, I would be lacking in elementary courage if I shared in such a hopeless attitude. I, for one, am willing to place my trust in the youth of America. If they demand action as well as preachments, I should be ashamed to chill their enthusiasm with the dire prophecy that to change is to destroy. I am unwilling to sneer at the vision of youth merely because vision is sometimes mistaken. But vision does not belong only to the young.

There are millions of older people who have vision, just as there are some younger men and younger women who are ready to put a weary, selfish or greedy hand upon the clock of progress and turn it back.

We who seek to go forward must ever guard ourselves against a danger which history teaches. More than ever, we cherish the elective form of democratic government, but progress under it can easily be retarded by disagreements that relate to the method and relate to detail rather than to the broad objectives upon which we are agreed. It is as if all of us were united in the pursuit of a common goal, but that each and every one of us were marching along a separate road of our own. If we insist on choosing different roads, most of us will not reach our common destination.

The reason that the forces of reaction so often defeat the forces of progress is that the Tories of this world are agreed and united in standing still on the same old spot and, therefore, never run the danger of getting lost on divergent trails. One might remark in passing that one form of standing still on the same spot consists in agreeing to condemn all progress and letting it go at that.

Therefore to the American youth of all parties I submit a message of confidence — unite and challenge! Rules are not necessarily sacred—principles are. The methods of the old order are not, as some would have you believe, above the challenge of youth.

Let us carry on the good that the past has given us. The best of that good is the spirit of America. And the spirit of America is the spirit of inquiry, of readjustment, of improvement; above all a spirit in which youth can find the fulfilment of its ideals. It is for the new generation to participate in the decisions and to give strength and spirit and continuity to our government and to our national life.

General "Statistique"

Major General Charles Dupont headed the "Second Bureau" (French Military Espionage) in Paris for many years prior to the World War. He was so zealous in the collection of information about military Germany, that he accumulated a vast store of knowledge about the national enemy. During the War it was his task to keep the French High Army Command posted about the movement of the enemy. Disdaining the use of written records or memory aids, he retained the name and rank of every officer stationed in the German Army on the Western front. He also memorized the number, strength, origin, itinerary, location, history and colors of every German company. Whenever he was called upon to report to Joffre or Foch, he could continue for many hours to rattle off the most circumstantial information about the enemy from memory. No war prisoner ever misled him. He could point out, almost without reflection, where the prisoner's information was misleading or incorrect. After the War, General Dupont realized the fondest dream of a spy. He was appointed Head of the Interallied Commission to Control German Armament and was now permitted to work openly and with authority in the land of the enemy.

US 1st Lady Urges Child's New Deal

Mrs. Roosevelt, In Chautauqua Address, Looks To Public Care Of The Underprivileged

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, making her annual appearance at Chautauqua Institution, Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 23, noon, asked a new deal for the nation's crippled and underprivileged children.

She said that this was one of "certain types of things we have felt were private responsibilities which should gradually be taken out of the private class and be made a public responsibility."

Mrs. Roosevelt emphasized she was referring not only to the "obviously physically crippled," but also to those who were "mentally and morally" crippled because of undernourishment, poor homes, poor environments and parents who did not know how to "handle" their children to give them a proper start in life, according to the New York Times.

Estimating the number of crippled children at between 300,000 and 500,000 and asking that "everybody try to see that there is no family in any community where the children are actually hungry."

"A great deal can be accomplished through education because there is so much even the poor could do in the way of prevention if they were told how to go about it."

She cited the Social Security Act, just passed by Congress, as an example of public recognition of "the fact that the Federal Government has a responsibility as well as the States."

Miss Josephine Roche of Colorado, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, said in a morning address that social security was dependent upon "recovery and reform," which must prevent "human and economic waste throughout our land."

Mrs. Roosevelt, who spoke to between 6,000 and 7,000 as the guest of the Chautauqua Women's Club, drove here from Washington with a friend, Miss Lorena Hickok, and remained tonight to see the opera, "The Barber of Seville." She planned to go to Hyde Park the next day to await the President's arrival after Congress adjourns.

In an interview, Mrs. Roosevelt said that the deaths of Wiley Post and Will Rogers in an Alaskan plane crash last week would not cause her to give up traveling by air.

"Planes will be involved in accidents as well as automobiles and other land conveyances," she said. "If I gave up traveling by air I also would give up traveling by land."

Olympic's Fate Facing Other Famous Liners

Several Well Known Ships Said To Be Slated For Scrapping Within Year

Confirmation by the Cunard White Star, Ltd., of the persistent reports that the famous old transatlantic liner Olympic would be scrapped has given rise to reports that several other well-known liners now in service will end in the "boneyard" within the next twelve months, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The Olympic, which has been tied up at Southampton since last April, is of 46,439 gross tons and is the largest of the British triple-propellor ships. Not only was she famous as one of the "big three" of the White Star Line, prior to the company's merger with Cunard, but she also made a name for herself as a troopship during the war.

Of the White Star's former "big three" only one, the Majestic, still is operating in the Atlantic run as part of the Cunard White Star fleet, as the Homeric was withdrawn several years ago for cruise operation out of British ports. The express liners now operated by the combine are Aquitania, Berengaria and Majestic.

Experts say that the Olympic's twenty-four-year-old hull still is among the finest afloat but, they point out, her old machinery and the heavy consumption of fuel oil, etc., make her uneconomical to run against the newer ships.

Decision of the Cunard White Star to sell her for scrap follows closely on the sale by the same company of another famous British liner, the Mauretania, former speed queen of the Atlantic, for similar purposes. The Mauretania now is being rapidly dismantled in an English shipbreaker's plant.

Line's Strength Not Weakened

Although the Olympic and Mauretania have been removed from the Cunard White Star's fleet, it was pointed out that the company was not weakening its strength as it was completing the giant Queen Mary, whose tonnage would probably exceed that of the two famous ships sold for scrap. The Queen Mary enters the Southampton-New York express service next June and is expected to make a bid for the "blue ribbon" of the Atlantic, now held by the Normandie.

Another well-known transatlantic vessel that figured in the news of the last few days was the Hamburg-American liner Resolute, which was sold by the Germans to Italy for use as a troop ship. The Resolute is well known to transatlantic and round-the-world cruise travelers. She and her sister ship the Reliance formed the nucleus of the Hamburg-American Line's great post-war fleet as the German company bought these two vessels from the United American Line when they decided to re-enter the Hamburg-New York service some time after the end of war. The Reliance will replace the Resolute this winter on the Hamburg Line's world cruise starting from New York.

Acquisition of the Resolute by the Italians adds to the great fleet of ships they are buying from foreign nations to transport troops or supplies to Eritrea. Some time before trouble arose between Italy and Ethiopia, Italian interests acquired the old Atlantic Transport freighters Montauk and Montana from the International Mercantile Marine Company for scrap but it would come as no surprise if the ships were used to carry troops and supplies.

Ships Bought by Italy

The old Canadian Pacific liners Melita and Minnedosa have also been acquired by Italy as have two vessels from the Greek Line. Reports received from Germany state that Italy also has bought a number of ships in Germany and other countries.

One of the latest sales to be closed is that of the Furness, Withy liner Fort St. George, well known in the New York-Bermuda-West Indies-Canadian trades for several years. The vessel, which was surveyed last week at the Robins plant of the Todd Shipyards Corporation, now is at Pier 97, Hudson River, and it is expected that her British flag will be replaced by the Italian flag in a day or two and that she soon will sail for Italy.

The sale of the Fort St. George was made in London and it is understood that the vessel will be used in the regular Mediterranean service of the Lloyd Triestino Line to replace a ship that has been released for troop transport work.

It was reported some time ago that the Italians were interested in acquiring several American-flag ships tied up in local waters but nothing came of the report. Shipping interests are naturally anxious to dispose of their obsolete idle tonnage but in view of the action of Congress in passing the neutrality bill it is doubtful if any sales can be made by Americans.

Spain Outlines Plan To Expand Its Film Output

Spanish Audiences Turning Away From Talkies They Cannot Understand

Backed by evidence that the supply of foreign films has reached saturation point, opinion grows in Madrid that a new era in the Spanish cinema world is coming. Spanish audiences are turning away from talkies they cannot understand and filling houses where films, good, bad or indifferent, are screened in Spanish, says the Christian Science correspondent.

For the first time provincial distributors of America, German and other pictures are meeting with a blank refusal to sign contracts by cinema owners, who say they are waiting for the heralded catalog of new Spanish productions.

Few Home Products

Thanks to the support by the Parents' Association (Association de Padres de Familia), an important step has been taken in a movement to capture for Spanish productions a big share of the national market. Hitherto of every 100 films shown, only three have been Spanish. In a short time it is hoped that there will be 25 pictures in Castilian out of every 100 shown.

Powerful Roman Catholic influence is at work and money has been lavishly subscribed for the initial developments. But extravagance, especially in overhead expenditure, which has spoiled the commercial prospects of previous attempts to produce Spanish films on a big scale, is being carefully avoided.

Company Formed

The prime figure in the administrative and commercial developments of the scheme, which has crystallized in the formation of a company known as ECE (Ediciones Cinematograficas Espanolas) is Don Manuel Herrera, brother of Spain's best-known figure in the Roman Catholic movement, a Jesuit priest. Another brother is the manager of the newspaper El Debate.

Those who have followed the trend of political affairs in Spain since the collapse of the "left" uprising last October will understand the full meaning of the movement which is directed against "undesirable" foreign films and purports not only to nationalize the cinema business but to purify it.

No Ban on Films

Spanish legislation has practically ignored the cinema. There is practically no ban on films, except on such films as may exhibit undesirable political tendencies or make Spain look ridiculous. Young children are not debarred from seeing films, fit not even for grownups and frequently exhibited in the open air so that all have access.

Speaking to Don Manuel Herrera, once a film director in Spain, the Monitor correspondent was told that some 1500 villages are ready to establish cinemas for the purpose of showing Spanish films, but they must be home productions.

Reject Hollywood

"Spanish" films made abroad fail to please. Ernesto Vilches, one of the leading figures of Spain's theatrical world, pointed out recently that Hollywood directors would insist on their own way, as when he was made to play "Don Juan" amid medieval surroundings but with furniture and servants belonging to the seventeenth century. His protests were in vain, as were those against the use of Mexicans in Spanish roles.

Quota Urged

It is calculated that no less than 90,000,000 to 100,000,000 pesetas (some $15,000,000) leave Spain in annual patronage of foreign film productions. The plan of the pioneers of the Spanish film is to get the Government to establish a quota.

Recent comments in the French press on the present situation in the Spanish cinema world emphasize the enormous increase in the popularity of the national film. Even mediocre films, it is stated, have an excellent market and it is believed that in order to retain their hold on the market some of the big American producers are considering catering for the demand by making pictures in Spain or buying such pictures to help their own bookings.

Galli-Curci Happy That Voice Is Free

Diva Writes Impressions Of Operation And Her Hopes For A 'New Career'

"I cannot tell you how happy I am. My voice is free again, unbridled after years of struggle with the 'potato,'" said Mme. Amelita Galli-Curci, famous coloratura soprano, at Chicago on August 14 shortly after her operation on a goitre which had been troubling her for years.

An account of her reactions, appearing on The New York Times, follows:

The result of my operation is just short of marvelous. Even now, when I am not fully recovered, I need hardly open my mouth to obtain the pure tones difficult when the "potato" (her name for the goitre) was in my throat.

I feel a new career is before me. If the doctor would permit it, I would sing now for sheer happiness, but for a time I must be careful. Several times each day I exercise the voice a little to make sure that in the healing process the vocal cords and tissues of my throat remain flexible.

It is a great joy to me to know that all over the world I have friends who wish me well, so many I did not know I had. It is impossible for me to answer individually all the greetings sent me, but I want now to thank all the kind people who gave me courage and are helping me to a quick recovery by their messages.

For fifteen years I had to sing around that great obstruction in my throat, and with it gone I am positive I will be able to sing better than ever.

My voice is like a young colt; I will have to restrain it. Already I know my singing will be much more spontaneous, free of the thinking it needed to get around the "potato," but as my throat becomes normal I will have to train myself again—become accustomed to its new acoustics.

Chicago has always been good luck to me. Here I made my first success, so I felt that the operation would be successful. Yet it required many nervous hours to decide I would have the "potato" out, but I resolved not to worry once the operation started. And I didn't.

Comedy highlights are provided by Una Merkel and Stuart Erwin, who continue their hilarious screen team, with antics that are peaked with laughter. As Joan and Gus, they take care of Miss Parker after her accident and also try to nurse her through her love affair with James Dunn.

"Star of Midnight" with William Powell and Ginger Rogers.

At the Hibiya Gekijo as a companion play to "Becky Sharp" is seen "Star of Midnight," an RKO-Radio picture which began September 18th and will continue until September 24.

Love and mystery form an intriguing combination in "Star of Midnight," starring William Powell and Ginger Rogers.

Telling a strikingly different type of love story, in which the delectable Miss Rogers, fresh from triumphs in the musical "Roberta," is the pursuer, and Powell the ostensibly wary quarry, the picture deals with a baffling mystery in modern New York's pageant and glitter.

A beautiful woman disappears, a newspaper columnist is killed under strange circumstances, and three different factions undertake the solution of the case .... each with a separate motive.

Powell and Miss Rogers team as a "Sherlock and Watson" combination in runnign down clues to the mystery. The two stars, long established among the screen's foremost favorites, appear together for the first time. Although they have worked at the same studios many times and often have acted on adjoining stages, Powell and Miss Rogers were never cast together until RKO-Radio opned the microphones for this intriguing mystery drama.

Colonel Hackett, Big Ten Football Official, Resigns

Christian Science Monitor

DETROIT, Aug. 14—Col. H. B. Hackett, famous Western Conference football official, said yesterday he will carry no whistle next fall, after 31 years of officiating.

"I was offered refereeing jobs again this year," Colonel Hackett said, "and I looked at that letter of resignation a long time before I signed it, but I figured I had better quit."

Col. Hackett is Assistant Administrator of the PWA under Secretary of the Interior Ickes and visited Detroit yesterday on government business.

"This will be the first fall in 31 years, except while I was in France during the World War, that I haven't spent every Saturday afternoon and Thanksgiving Day on a football field," Colonel Hackett said. "I never missed a game and never was late for a game. Snow, hail and sleet never got me on those occasion."

Colonel Hackett refereed the Chicago-Michigan game of 1905 in which the Maroons 2-to-0 victory broke the five-year winning streak of Fielding H. Yost's juggernaut. He called the safety against Michigan which Yost has disputed for 30 years.

"Yost always said I was wrong, but Coach Stagg said I was right, so I've always got a 50 per cent break out of the deal," the Colonel said. "That was some football game. I'll never forget what Tom Hammond (Michigan fullback) said to Walter Eckersall (Chicago quarterback) when Eckie lay down and pretended to be hurt after Curtis touched him on a punt. The field judge put Curtis out of the game, but I led him off the field, so Michigan fans always will blame me, I suppose.

"I always think I'm on the spot when I get this close to Ann Arbor. But it will seem queer this fall not Michigan games. I certainly have enjoyed the sport of football."

Colonel Hackett did not say why he is giving up officiating, but inferred that he is too busy with his PWA duties. At any rate that notation in middle-western football programs, "Referee—Col. H. B. Hackett, West Point," will be missing this year.

Polite Audience

Mr. Boomer, who was very proud of his voice, wished to sing at the village concert. Two of the promoters of the affair were discussing his application.

"Boomer certainly has an amazing voice," said one of them. "I remember that the last time he sang in public, his voice so completely filled the hall that the audience went out to make room for it."—Montreal Star.

League Planning Parley On Drug Traffic In 1936

Central Opium Board Starts Its Meeting At Geneva

With the beginning of the sittings of the Permanent Central Opium Board at Geneva on August 26, plans were expected to be made for the proposed Conference on the Traffic in Opium and other Dangerous Drugs, to be held under the auspices of the League of Nations, probably in June of 1936. A committee of experts will be invited to draw up a draft convention, according to the Geneva correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

It will be remembered that the last Assembly adopted a resolution which called for the conclusion of a Convention after the second consultation of members of the League. It is regarded as a matter of some urgency, to crown the work already done, though on the other hand there is no desire to refuse a reasonable time to the delegations to prepare themselves. The subject, however, is familiar to governments generally, and undue delay is to be deprecated.

For All Nations

The Conference will not merely be for members of the League but for non-members also, since the aim is to secure the same universality as for earlier Opium Conventions. There is no country which is not affected to some degree by the drug trade.

Further, the International Criminal Police Commission at Vienna, which in 1932 submitted the first draft Convention, is to be asked to co-operate in a consultative and expert capacity.

The first reference to governments, under the procedure of the League, was effected in August, 1933, and the second in July, 1934. Thus, as the rapporteur points out, they have had "sufficient opportunity to consider this important question. The Assembly, the Council and the Advisory Committee have no more than one occasion expressed the opinion that the conclusion of a Convention in regard to international co-operation for the suppression of the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs is a matter of great importance and urgency. In fact it was in view of the importance and urgency of the matter and in order to avoid further delay that the Fifteenth Assembly decided to delegate to the Council its power of taking the final decision in regard to the calling of the Conference."

How They Voted

The results of the reference to governments are set out as follows:

"On the first consultation replies were received from 38 governments of which the following 28 pronounced themselves in favor of the conclusion of a Convention: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, United Kingdom, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, France, Greece, Hungary, Iraq, Italy, Japan, Lithuania, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, the Sudan, Sweden, Switzerland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Venezuela.

"Two countries, namely the United States of America, and the Union of South Africa, indicated that they were not interested in this Convention. (It should be at once added, however, that the United States has been foremost in expert co-operation and has since made it known that it is vitally interested.)

"The following eight countries acknowledged the receipt of the Secretary General's communication or replied only in a preliminary way, namely, Costa Rica, the Free City of Danzig, Egypt, Estonia, Guatemala, Mexico, Peru and Uruguay.

Later Shifts

"On the second consultation 25 governments have replied to date, and of these the following 20 are in favor of concluding a convention: Austria, Belguim, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Canada, Chile, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Hungary, India, Irish Free State, Italy, Japan, Lithuania, Monaco, the Netherlands, Poland, Spain and Sweden.

"Three countries, namely, Finland, Latvia and the Union of South Africa, have stated that they are not interested in the convention, and Uruguay and Venezuela have acknowledged the receipt of the Secretary General's communication or replied only in a preliminary way."

Thus 33 countries are prepared to participate in the conference, four governments have declined to take part in it, whereas eight have acknowledged the receipt of the circular letters without indicating their views in the matter.

But in view of certain reservations, it appears necessary to revise the draft for the purpose of removing difficulties to which attention has been called.

Air Smuggling

It should be noted that at the last meeting of the advisory committee special attention was called to the use of aircraft in the illicit drug traffic. The Canadian and the United States delegates were particularly concerned about the employment of airplanes by the traffickers. An air patrol service is now functioning on the Canadian-United States border. The units of the patrol are to consist of two radio-equipped and armed airplanes, and one motor-truck to carry supplies.

Another danger is that of the use of the radio by unqualified persons for propaganda about drugs. It is a possibility to be closely watched.

The American expert made an important contribution to the debate on this occasion when he presented the results. Effective international police control of habit-forming drugs requires that governments should be in a position to account for all the raw materials from which drugs which enter the international traffic are produced. He stated that derivatives were being produced and prepared more and more in deceptive form to facilitate smuggling and illicit use. It was only by the determined effort of government laboratories that police activities could keep abreast of the traffickers. In the United States extensive researches were made to determine heroin in pills, drugs in cigarettes, etc. There was a deplorable lack of information regarding such drugs as cannabis, hashish, charas and marihuana. He suggested that governments co-operate along the lines of what may be termed police chemistry.

British Control Of Suez Shares Gives Whiphand

French Government Has No Real Part In Canal Through Egypt

In view of the reported orders of the British Admiralty to strengthen the defense forces around the Suez Canal, the actual status of the canal becomes an extremely interesting factor in the international situation.

The fact that the British Government holds seven-sixteenths of the shares of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Maritime de Suez is the key to this matter of practical control, despite the fact that the operating company is predominantly French as to its administration, according to a recent report from London to The Christian Science Monitor.

On the managing board there are 21 directors of French nationality, 10 British and one Dutch. Of the 10 British directors three represent the British Government and seven the shipping and commercial interests of Britain.

But the French Government owns no shares in the operating company.

It has always been understood that the British Government holds control of the Suez Canal. This is strengthened by the fact that since 1882 the defense of Egypt, through which the canal passes, is controlled by Britain.

Italy Concerned

Without the Suez Canal it is said that Fascist Italy's military preparations in East Africa would be impossible.

To what extent is this true? Do the canal's latest shipping returns support that contention.

In May, 1934, Italian ships passing through numbered 43, while in May, 1935, there were 103. It can hardly be thought that if the Suez Canal was not in existence that Italy would send her troops to Eritrea by the Cape—a further 10,000 miles by sea.

Great Britain was one of the greatest opponents to the digging of the Suez Canal, because at the time her project was to built a railway link. But when the canal was finished it became of incalculable value to Britain and her dependencies in the East.

Goes Back to Egypt

But what of the future of the canal? When it was opened in 1868 a concession for 99 years was given to the Suez Canal Company. On its expiration the canal will revert to Egypt, the owners of the land through which it passes. It will revert free of charge except for the value of any stores, buildings and equipment. That prospect is now 33 years ahead. In this connection it is recalled that an attempt was made by the Egyptian Government in 1909 to renew the concession, but the proposal was overwhelmingly defeated in the Egyptian Parliament.

The dues on goods are all paid in sterling, and on passengers at 10 gold francs a head.

The journey through the canal on a big steamer is a pleasant experience, especially if it comes after plowing through a heavy sea in the Eastern Mediterranean. The ship floats quietly past the long mole on which stands the monument to Ferdinand de Lesseps, the French engineer whose foresight made the digging of the canal possible. Staying a while at Port Said, perhaps to take on coal, which is done by Arabs with baskets on their heads, the ship glides slowly into the canal. On one side is the railway line and the fresh water canal, on the other the desert stretching away to Palestine, Trans-Jordan and Arabia.

SOCIAL AND PERSONAL NOTES

LANGUAGE SCHOOL OPENS

The opening exercises of the 1935-36 school year was held at the school of Japanese Language and Culture at 10 a.m. Thursday. Mr. Darley Downs, the Director, has just returned from furlough in America. In his brief address he spoke of the interested and sympathetic hearing he had in America as he spoke some 250 times on Japan. He found people particularly interested in the evidence he gave for his assurance that the Japanese people as a whole were not only the equals of superiors of westerners in ability and efficiency but in honesty kindliness and the general qualities that make folks good neighbors. This connection about the nature of human qualities of the Japanese he considered a basic necessity for the effectiveness of any foreigner working in Japan. He also found a growing interest in America in the study of Japanese history and culture.

The Dean of the Language Department Mr. Yahei Matsumiya, spoke on the relation of knowledge of the Japanese language and any real or vital appreciation of Japanese culture. While seeing Japan's beautiful scenery, painting, architecture, textiles, porcelains etc. is no doubt important, nothing, he said, can take the place of a genuine absorption of the inner spirit of the language itself, for any who hope to achieve true understanding and appreciation of Japanese life and culture. Dr. Kyugoro Obata gave a brief address in behalf of Baron Yoshiro Sakatani, the Honorary Director of the School.

Dr. Gilbert Bowles who has been on the Board of Trustees during the whole 22 years of the school's existence, and who was acting director during Mr. Downs's absence, gave greetings on behalf of the Board, of which he is the chairman. Pacifism And Big Fleets Criticized By Publisher ston, who contends that the policies of the United States, and to a lesser extent of the United Kingdom, in regard to the Far East lack comprehension for many of the factors involved. He shows that, with the actual possibilities of naval strategy in the Pacific, security for these nations cannot be found in ever increasing armaments. Lessons from the history of Atlantic warfare have been too thoughtlessly applied to the strategic problems of the Pacific. But here large distances and the lack of a continuous chain of suitable bases preclude the chance that even greatly strengthened American and Japanese fleets could fight each other conclusively.

In the Pacific, then, disarmament between the great powers is not particularly difficult but, on the contrary, a demand of common sense: fleets which cannot strike effectively are useless luxuries. A constructive match to this view is given in an article on "Air Communications and the Far East" by Major Oliver Stewart, air correspondent of the London 'Morning Post.' He foresees larger commercial groupings in the Pacific, cutting across national boundaries, as a result of the diminishing time distances in transport and communication, and with this an inevitable progress toward world homogeneity in ideas.

Other articles in the current number of 'Pacific Affairs' furnish an interesting illustration, as a group, of the increasing range and depth of studies which tend to obliterate the misunderstandings and dislikes between peoples, races, and interest groups. Thus, an analysis of the causes of failure in the Communist movement in China, by H. R. Isaacs, is followed by a detailed account of the reconstruction of Kiangsi Province and the problems encountered by the Chinese National Government in securing cooperation between officials and people, in an article contributed by Professor George E. Taylor, a British historian resident in Nanking.

"Racial Minorities in the Soviet Union" and the determined program of the Soviet authorities to convert a former Czarist regime of suppression and exploitation into a regime of equal rights and racial autonomy in cultural matters, are described by Archie Phinney, an ethnologist who has studied these matters at first hand.

The interest of the Institute of Pacific Relations in the survival and welfare of native peoples is further displayed in an article by Dr. E. S. C. Handy, of the Bishop Museum, Honolulu, on "Human Resources and Civilization", in which he shows how needlessly valuable traditional skills and other culture traits have been sacrificed and sketches the principles along which an effective program of conserving these potential contributions to the world might be put into operation.

Glenn W. Shaw gives an encouraging review of "Contemporary Japanese Literature." Other articles deal with "The Teaching of Modern Oriental History" and with "Soldier and Scholar in Ancient China." There are also over thirty pages of book reviews.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Anne Of Brittany

Anne of Brittany (1477-1514) married Emperor Maximilian of Germany by proxy on December 16, 1489. But she never saw either her husband or the country of which she thus became the Empress. Her French subjects threatened rebellion. To avoid any outbreaks, she decided to marry a French King. Never troubling to divorce her German husband, she married a second time, selecting King Charles VIII of France as her husband in 1491. Charles died in 1498, and Anne became engaged to marry Louis XII of France, a marriage which was never concluded.

Obviously Fallacious

"Have you a good biography?" said the minister at the bookstore.

"Yes, indeed, sir," replied the clerk, "Have you read "The Wealthy Preacher'?"

"Perhaps you misunderstood me," insisted the minister. "I never read fiction."

Oh!

In an effort to get the kindergarten children to talk freely, the teacher started a conversation about pets. "Do you have a cat or a dog, David?" she asked of a particularly shy child.

"No, ma'am," responded the boy; "I'm an only child."

Getting Herself Tolled

He told her of his great love,
"When a belle is told," she whispered winsomely, "a ring generally follows."

Miss Susan Ballard Sailing Tuesday After 43 Years Here

Pictures with Rembrandt effects are treasured in the mind of Miss Susan Ballard who obtained these "masters" by casual strolls through the streets of Tokyo when she first came here in 1892.

Now, 43 years later on the eve of her departure for her home in England where she will live permanently, Miss Ballard reviews sentimental pictures, sharing the picturesqueness which she found in Tokyo so long ago. Miss Ballard is leaving Tokyo station at 9:30 a.m. Tuesday and sailing from Yokohama on the P. and O. S.S. Rajputana at noon.

When she arrived with Bishop Bickersteth, first Anglican bishop in Japan, jinrikishas were the only means of transportation and when she went out at night, a servant preceded her, carrying a paper lantern. Occasionally they would come upon a street vendor, his load of wares illuminated by a high torch that cast Rembrandt shadows upon and around the assembled circle.

In those days, Miss Ballard recalled, there was no language school where one could imbibe portions of the language daily. Instead, she struggled along with a teacher who, she thought, probably didn't know the difference between an adjective and an adverb. Instead of the many varieties of Rose-Innes, there was only one grammar, Chamberlain's, which Miss Ballard characterized as the only grammar she ever found that was amusing.

Shimbashi was the only station and jinrikishas were wonderfully cheap. Miss Ballard used to ride from Ushigome to near St. Andrew's church for 12 sen! Today she would do well to get a taxi to cover the distance for 50 sen.

Everything in those days was delightfully cheap, Miss Ballard recalled. The Bishop asked her to work in Ushigome so she took a Japanese house there that had a very nice and a fairly large garden. She lived in the house for more than 30 years but she never forgot her first interview with the landlord.

She had asked him how much rent he wanted for the house and garden. He replied that he didn't feel that he could let the house and garden, the garden space was 200 tsubo, for less than 12 yen a month!

There was a small house attached to the grounds which rented for 5 yen a month and when Miss Ballard eventually bought the two houses there was a great competition to get the smaller house for which she charged only 45 yen a month!

"The servant that went with me from St. Hilda's mission to that house had to draw the water from a rather deep well, had to cook over charcoal, had to light an oil lamp for each room and do all the work for me yet she was glad to do it all for 6 yen a month and she fed herself out of her salary," Miss Ballard reviewed.

"The servant that I have had lately merely turned a tap and had all the hot water she wanted, turned another tap and the rooms were lighted, and turned a third tap and had the gas for cooking—all of which involved practically no labor but she expected 35 yen a month.

"I was here through the Russo-Japanese war and had a most interesting time. I visited regularly the Toyama Military hospital. The authorities were most cordial about letting me work there. At the beginning, I used to send my card in from the gate, asking permission to enter but after a short time, the officer on duty came out and said that the war office had given me full permission to come whenever I wanted to and that no one had the right to interfere," Miss Ballard continued.

"I used to visit the wards and also to give lantern lectures on the scriptures in the recreation room. If I sent a notice the day before, the notice was put in the orders of the day and certain wards were given permission to go to the recreation room in a body.

Miss Susan Ballard

"One night there was a great crowd of men. The room was packed and many were sitting in the window sills. I asked the officer of the day how many he thought were in the room and he replied that he had just been to the wards and he believed I had an audience of more than 1,000.

"The soldiers were always most orderly and appreciative. I used to give them Christian literature which they read and then sent home to their families and friends in the country."

Miss Ballard was in England all during the World war. Returning to Japan in 1921, her desire to lead a very undisturbed existence was made impossible by the great earthquake. When she first came to Tokyo, she made the city her headquarters but often went to the country for Evangelical work but lately she has confined her activities solely to Tokyo.

The reason she likes Tokyo, she said, was because one met so many interesting people here.

"I knew Miss Tsuda," she explained, "whose name is known all over Japan and whose memory is kept alive by Tsuda college. At Nikko I had the great pleasure of meeting and seeing a good deal of Miss Jane Addams. I also knew Dr. Mary Stopes, English scientist who is perhaps more popularly known for her work for birth control. Dr. Stopes founded and was first president of the Tokyo Women's club. I consider these three women perhaps the best known women in the world."

Miss Ballard spent a part of the last summer in Peiping wheer she had a delightful month at the language school. On her way to England, she will spend some weeks in Palestine and then continue by way of the Suez canal if, she added, "Mussolini hasn't by that time crossed my plans."

On Saturday afternoon, Miss Ballard was the guest of honor at a delightful party at the Canadian Legation. Lady Marler had invited Miss Ballard's friends for the afternoon. Miss Ballard has been an active member of Tokyo society and was one of the early presidents of the Tokyo Women's club.

Work On British Liner Advancing At Good Rate

or nine months she is substantially finished structurally.

If her observation lounge is at the moment a place of gloom, all the steelwork is there. Apart from the trimmings it only remains to cut some scores of windows through the solid steel plates and glaze them. The lofty first class dining saloon stretching from side to side of the ship is already here in skeleton—a red-painted skeleton with bones of steel. This is the foundamental ship which will be invisible behind stylish decorations.

But decorations will not be permitted to compromise or modify the structure. The tradition of the Cunard Company orders that a ship is handed over to the decorators only when every requirement of the architects has been fulfilled. The decorators must solve their problems by themselves. With what auspicious success they manage to do so is common knowledge.

Question of Speed

The same wise austerity is noticeable in the attitude of the Cunard White Star directors on certain matters about which the public are excusably anxious. Nearly every one is asking, for example, whether the Queen Mary will recapture for Great Britain the Blue Riband of the Atlantic which at the moment is held by the Normandie of France. The reply of the Cunard White Star directorate is that they are interested not in blue ribands but in a ship that has been designed to pay her way. The Queen Mary and the sister ship which may one day join her are intended to do between them the work which in the past needed three smaller vessels—the maintenance of a regular weekly service summer and winter alike across the North Atlantic.

The Normandie was begun later than the Queen Mary. The directors of the Cunard White Star Company have made no attempt to bring the measurement of their ship as first planned up to those of the Normandie, and they are understood to have no intention of doing so. The overall length of the Queen Mary is 1,018ft., that of the Normandie, with her sloping stem and stern, 1,027ft. At the water line the Queen Mary is the longer ship. Her gross tonnage—a measurement of cubic space—is put at about 73,500, compared with the Normandie's 78,000. The displacements, which means the weights of the two vessels when they were launched, were 37,000 tons for the Queen Mary and 27,000 tons for the Normandie. The final displacement figure for the Queen Mary will also be greater than that for the Normandie.

The expected speed of the British ship is an official secret. The Italian liner Rex secured the Blue Riband with an average speed of 28.97 knots. The Normandie has since captured the record. A writer in the Special Number published by The Times to commemorate the launch of the Queen Mary calculated that to fulfil her weekly journey across the Atlantic and have time to turn round her average open sea speed must be slightly in excess of 28 knots. One may repeat that she will be expected to achieve this performance regularly and in all weathers.

She must emulate the Mauretania, which for 27 consecutive round trips—two years of her long life—did not vary by more than five minutes in the time of her crossing.

Promotion System Wrecks Morale In Navy, Sims Avers

Asserts Yearly Selection Boards Have No Special Requirements

Officers assigned to key positions in the fleet and Navy Department have been notoriously inefficient and U .S. Navy morale is continuously declining because of a fundamental defect in the present promotion system for officers, charges Rear Admiral William S. Sims, in the current Atlantic Monthly released recently, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Asserting that the yearly selection boards have no standard requirements for promotion and that officers highly regarded by their contemporaries and the service in general are often rejected and less able ones promoted, Rear Admiral Sims advocates a revised promotion system, whereby the best officers would be promoted by soliciting the consensus of opinion from the grade directly above them.

This, it is claimed, would ensure advancement for deserving officers, for the most part unknown to members of the boards. The latter are often obliged to reject worthy candidates in favor of men known personally to a majority of the board members, states the writer.

"Each year, when the list of selections is published, the service is profoundly stirred by the advancement of officers with indifferent service reputation and the passing over of distinguished men. The service believes that the present system of selections makes injustice inevitable and this belief is beyond doubt undermining morale and reducing confidence in our high-ranking officers," it is held.

"Officers in key positions have sometimes neglected their education for high command, have never been to the Naval War College, and were appointed through political or social influence or through personal influence with the Secretary of the Navy.

"Due to the present policy of retiring 40 to 60 per cent of whole classes, naval officers have not the reasonable security of position necessary to efficiency; the naval career has ceased to be a life profession and become only a temporary job.

"If the President or the Secretary of the Navy would call upon all the active admirals of the navy to indicate the officers whom they would like to see in chief command in time of war, and would assign these officers to train our fleet in time of peace, the navy would be much better prepared for any such emergency. There is no use in building a fleet up to treaty strength unless measures are taken to ensure that it is in the hands of officers in whom the service has confidence."

Germany Appeals For Foreign Trade

Finance Chief, Opening Leipzig Fall Fair, Says Debts Must Be Paid In Goods

Count Lutz Schwerin von Krosigk, the German Finance Minister, opened the Leipzig Fall fair on August 25 with a speech in which he appealed to the world to accept German goods in order to enable Germany to pay her foreign debts, according to the Berlin correspondent of the New York Times.

Contrary to Economics Minister Hjalmar Schacht's frank recognition that the National Socialist policy handicapped Germany's financial and trade relations with the world, Count Schwerin von Krosigk, who used to stand in the ranks of the opposition Protestants but has withdrawn to the role of technical finance administrator, ignored the political situation entirely and dealt merely with technical conditions and international trade.

He praised the great achievements in the financial and economic fields attained by National Socialist Germany under the leadership of Adolf Hitler and deprecated "foreign exaggerations of their cost." But he failed to reveal anything about the current national budget, which has been suppressed, presumably because of its extraordinary deficit.

Count Schwerin von Krosigk started out by repudiating any autarchic desires on the part of Germany and reiterated that she could pay her foreign debts only in goods.

"We cannnot," he said, apparently with his eye on the United States, "do away with the bitter truth that foreign countries cannot in the long run maintain surpluses in their trade balances and at the same time collect their loans from debtor countries. It is simply impossible to eat your cake twice.

"We cannot do away with the truth. The German debt problem can be solved only by a reduction of interest and amortization charges, together with a moratorium, or by an increase in the German export surplus. This means that our will to pay must be met by the will of other countries to accept our goods."

He admitted that Germany's rearmament had increased her imports, thus destroying her export surplus and hence her ability to pay. His answer to this argument was that through her increased imports Germany had helped to improve the trade of other countries.

One point made by the Finance Minister was that, through reduction of the number of her registered unemployed, Germany had been able to reduce the cost of unemployment support from 2,900,000,000 marks in 1932 to 1,500,000,000 marks this year, while current revenues were running approximately 2,000,000,000 marks above the low point of the depression. But he warned that the task remaining was so great that it would be idle to expect any tax reduction.

Closing Of Suez Canal Would Be Held Drastic

Brings Up Question As To What 'Sanctions' Might Be Applied To Aggressor

Talk of Britain closing the Suez Canal to Italian transports carrying soldiers and supplies to East Africa brings up the question as to what "sanctions" might properly be applied by the League and its members against an "aggressor" in such a conflict, according to the London correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, whose article of recent date follows:

Britain has certain responsibilities under the League Covenant, along with other signatories to that agreement, and might be called upon by the League to exercise such responsibilities—if the Italo-Ethiopian Conciliation Commission and the League Council itself (following the sudden collapse of the three-power parley in Paris) fail to avert the threatened war in east Africa.

Under the League Covenant, Britain is committed to Article XVI to economic sanctions and even more drastic action. This article has never been applied by the League. And nobody quite knows how it would work out in practice. Can it, for instance, be put into operation by a sorely depleted League, shorn of German and Japanese membership, and with America's seat at the Council table still empty?

League Committee Acts

A tentative answer to some of these disturbing questions has just been provided by a small League Committee, whose report has escaped the international limelight, perhaps on account of its many technicalities.

The committee consisted of economic and financial experts from Britain, France, Soviet Russia, Canada, Italy and others. It was asked by the League Council to study certain restraining measures less comprehensive than those of Article XVI, which would not disturb the whole economic life of the country concerned, yet would be effective enough to induce that country to modify its course of action. The preventive measures "of a more or less deterrent character" might be applied to a country which is assumed to have broken its obligations in order to break the peace at an early date and has engaged in intensive war preparations.

First in the committee's list of restraining measures is the withholding from the law breaker of a limited number of key products. These would include all arms, ammunition and implements of war and key products for their manufacture. This would involve selecting certain commodities and putting a complete stop to their import.

Also "Peace-Products"

It might also be necessary to stop related products also widely used in peaceful industries Their stoppage would seriously interfere with the economic life of both the law-breaker and of the countries which produce and export these products. Any abnormal stocks would be clear evidence that a breach of the peace was imminent.

But the prohibition of these products, the committee points out, raises problems of great technical complexity, as certain metals and chemicals are of considerable importance for national defense.

A deterrent effect might be obtained by stopping supplies used solely for civilian purposes, such as coffee or codfish which the population is unwilling to forgo but, could do without. This would be a deterrent rather than a preventive measure.

A more serious step would be the interruption of the country's export trade. This would cut off its financial resources from abroad and therefore some of the sinews of war. Such pressure could be varied by applying it to the main exports or to a limited number of commodities. Its principal advantage is that it distributes the burden more equitably among the participating states.

Might Hurt Civilians

On the other hand certain disadvantages "render the whole system undesirable and impracticable." It may hit the civilian population too hard. Moreover, it may be unfair in its application. Powerful exporting countries would not feel the pinch so quickly as the smaller states. Finally, the prohibited exports may be just the imports greatly needed by other countries. Would the latter be willing to forgo them?

Preventing financial accommodation or the opening of special credits by other governments presents little difficulty, the committee states. But care must be taken not to leave the door open to intermediaries who although not the agents of the repudiating state within the strict letter of the law can get their funds across by means of investment trusts holding companies, and similar devices.

A Ball Of Neutron

All matter consists of atoms. Atoms in turn are subdivided into electrons, protons and atomic nuclei. These subdivisions of the atom possess an electric charge which affects their penetrative powers.

In 1932, it was discovered that there is a further subdivision of the atom, which possesses no electric charge of its own, and is capable of packing together into matter one quadrillion times as dense as water. This ultimate subdivision of the atom was called a neutron. Its penetrative power is extraordinary. It would be entirely possible to construct a neutron cannon ball which size for size would be 200 trillion times as heavy as a ball of gold. Such a cannon ball could penetrate 75,000,000 miles of armor.

World Oil Supply For 100 Years Seen

All Known And Prospective Reserves Said To Refute Fears Of Exhaustion

Exhaustion of the crude-oil supplies of the world, which has been a subject of much discussion since soon after oil was discovered in commercial quantities in the United States, about seventy-five years ago, appears to be at least a century away, from a study of the known and prospective reserves, together with improvements in drilling operations and in locating petroliferous areas.

In any industry which depends upon a raw material of limited and unrenewed supply it is expected that from time to time there will be scares about the approaching exhaustion of that supply, says the New York Times. In 1865 Professor W. S. Jevons caused great alarm by predicting the end of Great Britain's coal supplies.

In the United States, which is the largest producer of crude oil, Dr. David T. Day, head of the United States Geological Survey, predicted in 1889 the early exhaustion of that country's oil supplies. In 1891 and in 1900 he repeated his cry, which was taken up again in 1921 when Dr. George Otis Smith, then in charge of the survey, predited that there would be a future recovery of oil in the United States of only 9,000,000,000 barrels. From 1921 to 1935 more than 10,000,000,000 barrels of crude oil had been produced in the United States, with no sign of exhaustion.

Recently the United States Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines estimated that the crude-oil reserves of that country amounted to about 13,000,000,000 barrels, which at the present rate of production would last only about fourteen years. Also, an authority has estimated the proved oil reserves of the world at 24,000,000,000 barrels, half of which was in the United States. At the present rate of production, about 1,500,000,000 barrels annually, this would mean exhaustion in about sixteen years.

Figures Said to Mean Little

If these figures really meant anything, it is held, there would be a serious cause for alarm. A study of the development in crude oil production, however, shows that they mean little, for they fail to take into consideration many factors, among which are the large areas that have not been proved geologically, though there is good reason ot believe they are petroliferous. Other factors which are being ignored include the improvements in methods of locating oil-bearing areas, in recovering oil from reservoirs already known, and those in drilling, which already have increased the depth at which oil can be produced profitably.

Under the low prices prevailing, methods have been devised for increasing the proportion of oil that may be recovered commercially. When prices rise, which they would during a period of scarcity, there is little doubt that these methods would be applied and perfected. In addition, prospective areas, which are now virtually inaccessible, may be explored and exploited.

On these scores, it is believed that the oil industry's expectation of life can be multiplied by at least four, which would bring it beyond the close of the current century. Further than that time, it probably would be unwise to go, for there is no sufficient evidence.

All Nations Hunt Liquid Fuel

The movement to find or create native supplies of liquid fuel is universal. In part the motive is economic, but it also must be admitted that it is partly militaristic. Oil is now essential to all three branches of military service, and only two important powers, the United States and Russia, have oil supplies sufficient to meet their needs in time of war. Other countries thus will continue to seek supplies, which should tend to prolong the time of the exhaustion of oil.

The efficiency of the oil industry is not questioned. On the technical side the developments of science have been utilized fully. The improvement of distillation processes in the refinery, the development of the new process of hydrogenation and the initiation and development of the cracking plants have done much to increase both the quantity and the quality of motor fuel.

The recovery of gasoline from crude oil now exceeds 50 per cent, compared with 18 to 20 per cent a comparatively few years ago. A further improvement in the internal-combustion engine might result in the need of less motor fuel, which also would tend to lengthen the life of crude-oil supplies.

In 18th-century England no modest person was ever seen in a bathing suit. The bather rented a "bathing-machine," a covered wagon that was backed out into the water. Its particular feature was a canvas awning which was let down over its back steps to conceal the occupant from public view and thus permit him "to enjoy the pleasure of bathing in so private a manner as to be consistent with the greatest delicacy."

Audience League Urged In Britain To Maintain Arts

Puts Personal Above Mechanized Aspects Of Music And Drama

A League of Audiences has been formed in Britain to educate those behind the footlights in their responsibility for the success of entertainments, according to the London correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Officially, the league's aims are "To preserve and promote personal interpretation of music and drama—personal as distinct from the mechanized; to see that actors and musicians are supported by the audiences they need in order that these arts shall continue and progress."

Realization that the audience which "assists" through its sympathy and response is in danger today of dwindling to insignificance owing to the increase of mechanized entertainment, and the belief that the audience is necessary for the preservation and future development of the personal interpretation of music and drama, led to the founding of the league by a group of widely representative people. Among its supporters are The Most Rev. William Temple, Archbishop of York, Sir Josiah Stamp, prominent industrialist, Sir James Barrie, John Masefield, Poet Laureate, George Arliss and C. B. Cochran.

To Lead People Back

But the league, according to Mr. Alfred Wareing, the honorary organizing secretary, is not in any way hostile to automatic entertainment. On the contrary it realizes that the gramophone, cinema and radio have brought drama and music into the experience of many millions of people who before knew little or nothing of them. But the league contends that part of its own work is to "lead the people back to the unique pleasure which only personal interpretatioon can bestow." To this end it is promoting a Music and Drama Bill.

The league maintains that "the time has come when the British Government should acknowledge Music and Drama as important factors in national life, and deserving its support as fully as libraries, museums, picture galleries" and under this bill a Music and Drama Commission would be set up and provided with funds. These funds (a capital sum of £1,500,000 and an annual payment of £50,000 is suggested) would be administered by the eight commissioners—a peramnent body appointed by the Crown. Five of these commissioners would be unpaid, one of them being a member of the House of Commons and responsible to Parliament.

The commissioners would have wide powers to promote and encourage music and drama. They would give assistance and advice to anyone intiiating such enterprises; they would collect, prepare and publish information, promote instruction and training and assist those who wish to present British music and drama overseas. They would make advances by grants or loans to persons and local authorities to promote the interests of music and drama and encourage private enterprise.

While the commissioners do not propose to establish a national theater, they would assist such a theater when it was set up. They would also help the repertory theaters, permanent orchestras and choral societies.

The bill proposes to provide the necessary funds by earmarking a small percentage of the revenue from mechanized amusement.

Bondholders Insist Cuba Pay Interest

A demand that the Cuban Government set aside in a trust fund a sufficient amount to pay interest in default and accruing on public works bonds during the current fiscal year has been made on President Carlos Mendieta by a bondholders' committee representing American investors, according to a statement issued in Havana on August 31 by that committee. The letter delivered to the Chief Executive was signed by Senator Gerald P. Nye, chairman, before his departure for the United States the previous day.

The counsel of the committee pointed out that delay in payment of interest on these bonds would seriously injure Cuba's credit abroad and would bring untold hardship on many small investors throughout the United States, according to the New York Times. He asked the government to set aside $6,600,000 out of the more than $10,000,000 which the government expects to receive from taxes this year for this purpose and which is now being diverted into general Treasury funds.

The letter declared:

"In view of your assurance to the United States today that Cuba firmly intends to pay all its rightful debts, we now ask you to afford American investors in public works bonds a minimum of protection to which they are by right entitled and that your government place the money pledged from the special public works fund in a separate trust account to be held inviolate until the payment of interest due on these bonds is officially resolved by the constitutional government to be elected next December."

President Mendieta has refused to discuss the public works bond issue defaulted since the end of 1933 with representatives of the American bondholders now in Havana on the ground that the present provisional government has no jurisdiction in the matter.

Meaning Of Rings

In many parts of this country during the middle of the last century, both men and women indicated their attitude toward matrimony as well as their marital status by the way they wore a ring. When on the first finger it meant they wanted to be married, on the second that they were married and, on the fourth that they wished to remain single.

Radio News Read Widely Today In South America

Papers Make Liberal Use Of Propaganda From Various Capitals

The introduction of radio news, much of it pure propaganda, is one of the latest and most interesting developments of South American journalism. Several of the big national newspapers, including dailies of international ranking, contain their quota of government-subsidized news from Europe; and, incidentally, the independent commercially run news agencies are having an anxious time watching and competing with their new rivals, according to the Christian Science Monitor's correspondent at Santiago, Chile.

The independent agencies which supply South America with its news are principally America. They have developed wide-reaching and remunerative services south of Panama. Healthy competition between them has operated to the benefit of their subscribers who obtain thousands of words every day from every part of the world at a reasonable price.

European Agencies

The principal European agencies operating in South America are Havas, the French concern; Transocean, German, and Agencia Stampa, Italian. Havas was one of the first news agencies in the South American field and was paramount in several countries during prewar days.

It has recently made a fresh effort to increase its influence on both the east and west coasts of the continent and, although well subsidized by the French Government, endeavors to operate on a commercial and strictly journalistic basis. With its staff of home-recruited newspaper men, direct radio transmission from Paris and modernized servicing arrangements for the South American papers, Havas is providing a certain amount of competition for the non-subsidized American agencies. Its consistent harmonious voice with that of the Quai d'Orsay, however, is a constant reminder of the dual role it has to fulfill.

With a view probably of proving the impartiality of its news, Havas recently has carried reports and editorial quotations unfavorable to French political and commercial policy.

Interesting Reading

The German and Italian official agencies, which supply many thousands of words daily to South America's newspapers, deal solely in propaganda, though it would be unfair to deny that many of the facts they broadcast make interesting reading for the majority. But both never fail to laud the policies of their own countries and condemn what is deemed hostile action in other countries.

These European countries which are developing their information services in South America use political pressure, when polite and possible, to obtain newspaper space. Two reasons are given for the increased publicity obtained. In the first place, owing to revised economic standards enforced by the universal depression the papers have seized the opportunity of free radio information.

Secondly, owing to the continent's reliance on important European markets for prime commodities, it has been easy for diplomats negotiating compensation pacts to suggest governmental recommendations to some of the newspapers to take free service from certain countries.

The Dizzy Bridge

The Chinese believe that evil spirits can travel only a straight path, whereas a crooked line confuses them and serves to discourage their passage. The characteristic Chinese wavy style of architecture is a result of this belief. It was with the same thought in mind that the Dizzy Bridge in Shanghai was built. The corners and zigzags of the bridge are believed to be proof against the passage of the Evil One.

The Origin of the Dollar Sign

The Straits of Gibraltar were called the Pillars of Hercules by the ancients. When the city of Cadiz (or Gades) was founded by the Phoenicians on Spanish soil, they adopted the Pillars of Hercules as their emblem and proceeded to engrave the device on their coins, which gained wide circulation. When Charles I of Spain became Charles V of Germany, he added the Roman scroll to the Pillars of Cadiz, thus creating the scroll entwined pillars, engraved on the Pieces of Eight. The emblem was adopted by the United States, which transformed it into our well known Dollar Sign ($).

Elements Force U.S. Girl To Quit Channel Swim

N. Y. Herald Tribune

DOVER, England, Aug. 24.—High wind, rain and a rough sea forced Miss Eva Morrison, twenty-five-year-old Boston hospital librarian, to give up an attempt today to swim the English Channel when she was within four miles of her goal, Cape Grisnez, France.

"I feel swell," said Miss Morrison when she returned here. She expressed determination to try it again next summer.

"It was a swell swim, but they told me no one could do it in such a sea in a milion years," the American said. "I thought I could have gone on swimming for miles, but they would not let me."

Three times Miss Morrison and the accompanying motorboat were almost run down by steamships. She passed twelve hours, fifty-two minutes in the water.

Captain Harry Pearson, channel-swimming expert who coached Miss Morrison, said he was amazed at her condition and added "She is the fastest and strongest swimmer I have seen.

Submarines And War

The Allies sunk only five German submarines in 1914, 19 in 1915 and 22 in 1916. But during 1917 and up to November, 1918, they sent 132 of them to the bottom, or one every 120 hours. During those last two years, however, Germany was making them at the rate of one every 90 hours, an astonishing production schedule for such a large and intricate piece of machinery.

Pacific Keeps Promise of Peace, Tokugawa Tells Luncheon Club

While storms are gathering on the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic ocean, the Pacific ocean is calm and peaceful, fulfilling its promise of placidity and peace which marked its discovery 422 years ago by Balboa, Prince Tokugawa declared Wednesday noon in addressing the Balboa day celebration of the Pan Pacific club of Tokyo and the Pan Pacific Association of Japan at the Imperial hotel.

Guests of honor were diplomatic representatives in Tokyo of countries bordering the Pacific. Among those at the speaker's table were Mr. Edwin Neville, American counsellor, and Mrs. Neville, the Chinese Ambassador, General Tsiang Tso-Ping, the Soviet Ambassador, Mr. Constantin Youreneff, The Siamese Minister, Mr. Mitrakarm Raksha, and the Spanish representative. The luncheon, which was the first since the summer recess of the club, was well attended.

Following the addresses, Prince Tokugawa was re-elected president and Viscount Inouye, vice president, of the Pan Pacific Association.

In his opening address, Prince Tokugawa declared:

"The Pacific Ocean, its shores and its islands, will be the world's great hereafter." These words were delivered from the lips of a great American statesman over half a century ago, and the prophecy of William H. Seward has become true today.

"We are gathered here today to commemorate the 422nd anniversary of Balboa's discovery of the Pacific Ocean. On September 25th, 1513, Vasco Nunez Balboa climbed the heights of Dairen in the Isthmus of Panama, and for the first time he behind the calm, placid ocean which he took possession of in the name of the King of Spain.

"For four centuries since Balboa's discovery, the call of the Pacific has inspired the hearts of the peoples of Europe and America to expand into that region. But, to us, the people of the Orient, long before Balboa's discovery, the Pacific Ocean had been the home of our ancestors and the cradle of our civilization. It was the story of Ancient China and of the Island of Zippangu which led European explorers to the Pacific Ocean. Thus the star of expansion took its westward course until great empires and republics have been built on the shores of this ocean.

"Today the prophecy of the American statesman has come true, and the Pacific Ocean has become the centre of human activities. The centre of civilization has shifted from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. While storms are now being gathered on the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean, the Pacific Ocean is calm and peaceful. While the statesmen of Europe are concentrating their energies in an endeavour to secure a peaceful solution to the Italo-Ethiopia controversy, we are enjoying peace and tranquility in the Pacific basin.

"Today here are no questions among the Pacific countries which cannot be settled by peaceful diplomacy. The socalled naval rivalries among Great Britain, the United States and Japan can be easily solved, if Great Britain and America can understand Japan's principle of non-menace and non-aggression. The gradual rapprochement of the USSR and Japan will promote the peace of East Asia, and the growing friendship and cooperation between China and Japan will bring an era of permanent peace and tranquility in the Far East.

"As we celebrate the 422nd anniversary of Balboa's discovery of the Pacific Ocean today, may we join our efforts for the promotion of peace and security in the Pacific Ocean

Mr. Youreneff, Soviet Ambassador, spoke as follows:

"Today's meeting occurs on the Balboa Anniversary, the 422nd anniversary of the day when the intrepid Spanish navigator Balboa reached the eastern shores of the Pacific Ocean, the first European to do so.

Since then, with the passing of the ages, close relations have been established along the whole coast of this great Ocean between the various nations inhabiting the bordering countries. Many economic and political problems have arisen from time to time. But there has been a steady interchange of scientific and cultural progress between them.

"The Pan Pacific Club is a very notable organization, inasmuch as it works with the object of uniting the nations of the world; it strives to strengthen the mutual understanding of peoples, and aims at strengthening the bonds of friendship which already exist between the people of Japan and those of other nationalities who are living in the country.

"Under the able guidance of our President, His Excellency Prince Tokugawa, and of His Excellency Viscount Inouye, the Pan Pacific Club has become not merely a highly useful organization but also a pleasant meeting place for the representatives of different nations, where in a friendly atmosphere the valuable task of strengthening the mutual understanding of us all is carried on. As the representative of a country that is forever striving for peace and for friendly relations with the whole world undisturbed by war or aggression, I must express my deep sense of gratitude to the Club for the great work it has undertaken."

The First Dollar

The word Dollar was derived from the German Thaler, originally called Joachimsthaler, after Joachimsthal (Valley of Joachim) near Karlsbad, Czeechoslovakia, where a famous silver mine was located in the 16th century. The coins minted out of that silver became known as Joachimsthaler, later abbreviated to Thaler. Foreign countries were quick to adopt it, translating the name into their own languages. The United States dollar came here via the mint of the Netherlands.

Kikugoro's Actors' School

wilds of western America, but are not the possession of the wild Irish.

Kikugoro is Uppermost

Kikugoro, however, covers up the sins and omissions of the young people who are developing their histrionic ability. With a gold fan he makes magic as he dances in "Suo Otoshi", the comic posture play adapted from the No Kyogen. He fascinates his audience as he moves to the chorus and musicians, a brilliant background in their stiff kamishimo adorned with the fan crest of the Kikugoro actorclan. He is at his best in comic pantomime and pleases the Kikugoro actor clan. He is at his by his ready wit which he does not express in words but in movements.

The long-drawn-out dancing style of Kikugoro, however, cannot be appreciated at first glance. To really enjoy his dancing an acquired taste is necessary. One of Kikugoro's favorite roles, and honest plasterer of Yedo, in a Mokuami melodrama, displays this actor as a master of stage business. So poor that he has to borrow his wife's kimono, his attempts to hide the sleeves and to walk convulses his audience, and playing to the gallery, he repeats his tricks,—easily making his audience laugh or cry.

Seminar Courses On Japanese Culture Interests 125 Scholars

More than 125 foreign students of Japanese culture attended a discussion meeting at which plans for this fall's study were made, Thursday afternoon at the Peers' club. The meeting was called by the Society For International Cultural Relations.

Viscount Nagakage Okabe, acting chairman of the board of directors of the society, explained that the study of Japanese culture will be conducted in three seminars beginning October 15.

"In the past," he declared, "Japan has been so busy studing the culture of other countries that she gave no thought to those who wanted to study her culture. Now we are trying to extend the helping hand to those who want to be students of Japan."

Another speaker was Mr. Setsuichi Aoki, general secretary of the society who outlined in detail the subjects to be dealt with in each seminar, and the method of study. Registration figures proceeding the meeting showed that 23 persons had signed for the first course, 31 for the second, and 64 for the third. Many have registered for more than one course. Another large group registered during the meeting.

For the second seminar, eight lectures are to be given by well known speakers and there is to be floor discussion. The subjects and the speakers are:

Educational and Cultural Background of the Japanese from the Standpoint of Thinking and Psychology by Mr. Nyozekan Hasegawa, well-known literary critic; Geographic and Climatic Influences on Japanese Development by Dr. Sakuhei Fujiwara, director of the Tokyo Meteorological Observatory; Western Influences on Japanese History and Culture by Dr. Izuru Shimura of Kyoto Imperial University; Social Status of Japanese Women by Mrs. Waka Yamada; History and Trends of Japanese Literature by Mr. Kan Kikuchi, novelist; the Japanese People from the Folkloric Standpoint by Dr. Kosaku Hamada, professor of ethnology at the Kyoto Imperial University; Japanese Family Life by Dr. Shigeto Hozumi, professor of family law at the Tokyo Imperial University, and Buddhist Philosophy and its Effects on the Life and Thinking of the Japanese People by Dr. Daisetsu Suzuki, professor of Tendai University.

The first seminar is to be for a small, select group of scholars who will meet once a week for a leisurely give and take of ideas and study in conjunction with Japanese scholars. Subjects for study and discussion are to be fixed by the group.

The third seminar topics will include an introduction to Japanese art, with lantern slides; dance and music with demonstrations and landscapes of Japan.

Britain To Rebuild Navy At Huge Cost

Due To Modernize It From Top To Bottom To Overtake Italy In The Mediterranean

Modernization of the British Navy from top to bottom at an immense cost is almost sure to come in the near future because of the revelation that Great Britain is not strong enough at the moment to check Italy single-handed in the Mediterranean.

Whatever may be the outcome of Premier Mussolini's adventure in East Africa, it is plain that the British naval shipyards will be busier in the next five or ten years than at any time since the building race that preceded 1914, according to Ferdinand Kuhn Jr. in an article to the New York Times from London on August 31.

"We have only half a navy," complained Sir Bolton Eyres-Monsell, First Lord of the Admiralty, early this Summer before the Italo-Ethiopian dispute had become a world crisis. Few believed him then. British big navy spokesmen had been talking so extravagantly for years that almost every confession of naval weakness was looked upon as propaganda.

It has taken a first-class shock to prove that the admirals were partly right. Thanks to Italy, far more than to the big navy propagandists, British now realizes for the first time in centuries that she is no longer the unchallenged mistress of the seas in the Eastern Hemisphere.

Malta's Position

In particular, the public has become conscious of the unpleasant fact that Malta cannot be held against a combined attack by an Italian navy and air force and that Britain's age-long dominance of the Mediterranean can be preserved only with the assistance of France.

Three years ago, in the Far East, there might have been a similar shock to the British people when Japan flung down her challenge on the mainland of Asia. At that time every one who knew the naval situation in the Pacific knew that Britain could not hold Hongkong against a hostile Japanese navy and would be forced to retire upon Singapore.

But the Far East was thousands of miles away, and whatever happened in Manchuria could have only a slight effect upon the British Empire trade routes. The Mediterranean is much nearer home.

This time British naval weakness has been exposed in the waters between Gibraltar and Suez, which for generations have been the lifeline of the empire. And the British people are disturbed. They have every reason to be.

It must not be assumed, however, that Britain has abdicated her control of the Mediterranean. After the war she agreed with the United States to share her world-wide naval supremacy, but there is no sign as yet that she is ready to share Gibraltar, Malta, Suez or Aden with Italy. The British, in other words, have no intention of letting their present disagreeable position become permanent.

A Series of Accidents

With commendable coolness they remember that it was a series of accidents that gave Italy her present superiority in Mediterranean waters. It was an accident that the emergence of Fascist Italy did not precede but followed the Washington treaty, which bound Britain, Japan and the United States to reduce their naval strengths and scarcely took Italy into account at all.

It was an accident that Mussolini was able to develop a swift, highly mobile navy at a time when Italy was bound by no agreement and when disarmament happened to be politically popular in Britain and the United States.

The British also have the comforting knowledge that no matter how "antiquated" their fleet may be, compared with Italy's, it still holds undisputed sway in the Atlantic, which means that it can block the western exit of the Mediterranean to Italy at any time. The Italian Navy is superbly able, as one expert put it today, "to nip out quickly and nip back again to its harbors," but not even the maddest of Mussolini's editors claims that it can wrest Gibraltar from Britain.

What, then, are the British likely to do so that they can once more feel comfortable in the Mediterranean? The answer is, first of all, to build speedy light cruisers that could overtake and outgun Italy's and, secondly, to keep a swarm of fast destroyers capable of a speed of 40 knots in Mediterranean waters.

Italy's Ships Speedy

Italian destroyers of the Condottieri class have broken the world's records for speed. The British will have to do as well or better. The possession of capital ships in narrow seas are of secondary value, although Italy's two new 35,000-ton battlships may bring a reply from British shipyards when the Washington treaty restrictions expire.

In the light of the present crisis the British Government now realizes the primary need for its navy is quality rather than quantity. Faster and more powerful ships will have to be built to replace the vessels left over from World War days. Except in cruisers, it is not expansion but modernization all along the line that the government plans to prescribe.

Stronger Defense Urged For Sweden

Board, After 5-Year Study Asks Larger Air Force, Army And Unified Command

A complete overhauling of Sweden's defense system is recommended in a report presented to the government on August 27 by a commission that has just concluded a five-year inquiry.

The chief proposals are for a big increase in aviation strength on a seven-year plan estimated to cost the equivalent of $18,000,000; a reduction of naval strength, with gradual abolition of capital ships and concentration on light warships, and unification of the defense command under a single general staff for all branches. Measures also are recommended to strengthen the land forces, according to the New York Times.

The commission recommends that the organization of defense should immediately be put under the control of one supreme commander, even in time of peace, and that cooperation between all the defense arms should be established.

It urges an increase in army officers from the present figure of 1,686 to 2,112. The air force under, this plan, would be increased to twenty-one divisions and the number of first-line aircraft would be raised from 100 to 257. Including the eighty instructional planes, the total number of modern aircraft would thus be raised from 180 to 337. The aviation personal would be increased to 255 officers, in 175 non-commissioned officers and 1,020 enlisted men.

The commission held that the usefulness of battleships in defense did not justify the cost of construction. The more recent battleships of the present fleet, it declared, should be modernized to give them suitable protection against attacks from the air. The cost of reconstruction of the fleet is estimated at about the equivalent of $13,000,000 and the program would be extended over ten years.

The commission also proposed that the age limit for compulsory military service be extended from 42 to 45 years.

Little Entente Marks 15 Years Of Allied Effort

tries that the presence of a Hapsburg in Vienna would act as a perpetual irritant and provide an element of tension and unrest in the Danube basin which would prevent friendly relations with Austria. And a restoration, it is felt here, would in the long run only encourage aggression from without. A Hapsburg on the imperial Austrian throne in Vienna would be considered a danger to peace while democratic Austria would always find friends and allies in the Little Entente. That is why a declaration of policy by the Little Entente Council regarding the Hapsburg restoration was recently considered desirable.

To the aggressive imperialism of their more powerful neighbors these three smaller states could muster in case of emergency an army of about 700,000 soldiers, including gendarmes. Czechoslovakia alone can put out 191,000 men.

According to a recent estimate their joint air force amounts to 1887 airplanes. In addition Roumania has 26 sea planes. Indeed, the Little Entente represents a population of almost 50,000,000, surely a power for peade to be reckoned with both in Geneva and elsewhere, its friends here declare.

British Trades Unions Study Red Activities

mendation. They would be creating unnecessary martyrs and would be strengthening the Communist Party instead of weakening it.

Heresy Hunt Deprecated

Mr. J. Bromley (London), a representative of the Union of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen, also opposed the General Council, while pointing out that his organization did not desire that every individual exponent of Communism should think that it was supporting his particular method of putting forward his theory. The union's own experience with its Communist members had been a sigularly happy one, and it had always known where the Communist members would be in a strike. They had seen their Communist members, with the passage of time and the coming of grey hairs, quietly moulding themselves into the general structure of the trade union movement. At 21 a man thought that he knew everything, and at 25 he was sure that he knew everything while most of them spent the rest of their lives in finding out how little they knew. To kill a young enthusiast was dangerous. They ought not to begin a heresy hunt within their movement. The trade union movement had made mistakes, and would continue to make mistakes but it was the greatest movement there had ever been, and the greatest band of brotherhood which the world had seen.

Mr. T. E. Naylor, of the London Society of Compositors, said that if the reference back were carried, he hoped that the General Council would issue another circular indicating that a member had the right to be a Communist, a Tory, a Liberal, or anything else until the rules of his union prevented him from being a member because of his political beliefs. His own experience of the Communist movement had convinced him that it was a disruptive element, and the new circular ought to lay it down that delegates should represent the views of the unions that if they did not do so the union had in its own hands the power to prevent them from being nominated.

Mr. F. B. Figgins (Glasgow, National Union of Railwaymen) said that the people called Communists were in many cases not only the most active inside the branches but also the most active inside the station, the workshop, and the depot, in maintaining conditions of labor. The circulars were an expression of dictatorship.

Dictatorship Denied

Mr. C. Dukes, replying for the General Council, said that to describe the recommendation to the unions as dictatorial was to put a strain upon language. The very unions which supported this resolution and claimed to have provisions in their rules for dealing with disruptive elements were not, in fact, dealing with them. Complaints had been received from trades councils all over the country, and when the General Council asked for information the replies showed that in many cases the disruptive elements came from the organizations which were supporting the motion now before the Congress. "You cannot ride two horses," Mr. Dukes said. A few years ago the fight against the disruptive elements centered in the trade union branches. Immediately the disruptive elements were defeated in the branches they transferred their activities to the trades councils.

The voting on the first motion to refer back the circular to the unions was as follows:—

For	1,427,000
Against	1,868,000
Majority against	442,000

The voting on the motion of censure was as follows:—

For	539,000
Against	1,944,000
Majority against	1,405,000

Out-Of-Work Insurance

The Congress next considered a number of resolutions on unemployment insurance. On the motion of Mr. W. Holmes (Agricultural Workers' Union), the Congress called upon the Government immediately to introduce legislation to provide a scheme of unemployment insurance for agricultural workers. Another resolution asked for the extension of unemployment insurance to all workers, regardless of income, and demanded that benefit should not be refused to any worker because of a trade dispute unless he was a direct participant in the dispute. A third claim was that benefits should not be lost if the cause of a stoppage of work was the contravention of a properly negotiated agreement by the employer.

Mr. J. Marchbank (National Union of Railwaymen) asked for an assurance that the adoption of the resolutions would not interfere with the system of certificates of exception from insurance for categories of workpeople not liable to discharge. Railwaymen contributed to superannuation funds that would be jeopardized if the resolutions were accepted literally.

Mr. G. Bearóworth (Distributive Workers' Union) replied that the terms of the resolutions were to be construed as in line with the General Council's policy of comprehensive insurance, and Mr. Marchbank did not press his opposition further.

The Constructional Engineering Union complained that the practice of the labor exchanges in notifying vacancies gave opportunities for the undermining of industrial agreements. The union's spokesman said the practice in constructional engineering, when a man was required to work away from home, was to pay his travelling expenses and lodging money. If the employment exchange notified an unemployed man of a job at a distance, the employer was only under obligation to pay the wage rate of the district, and the travelling and lodging allowances disappeared.

Republican Party Wants $2,000,000 For Campaign

Nippon Dempo-United Press

WASHINGTON, Sept. 25.—The Republican national executive committee met today to discuss loans for raising a campaign fund of $2,000,000. In discussing the plans committeemen unofficially stressed the importance of a Republican nominee whose home is West of the Alleghanies and mentioned the names of Governor A.M. Landon of Kansas; Col. Frank Knox, Senator W. E. Borah and Ex-President Herbert Hoover.

The same committeemen said that Mr. Ogden Mills, former Secretary of Treasury; Senators David A. Reed of Pennsylvania and Representative James Wadsworth of New York lacked Western apeal.

Most members admitted that the assassination of Senator Huey Long had weakened the movement to split the liberal vote but they saw the possibility that it might also split the "Solid South" with a candidate favored by conservative Democrats.

Need Of Skilled Labor Appears In Canada

Canadian construction and allied industries are faced with a shortage of skilled labor. During the depression period few apprentices have been trained in the building trades, while skilled artisans have lost a good deal of their technical ability due to enforced idleness.

According to a statement issued by the Canadian Construction Association the revolution in manufacturing methods has left a surplus of single machine operators and a rapidly diminishing supply of highly skilled machinists according to the Christian Science Monitor. Many skilled machinists have left the factory, preferring a lower hourly rate with more regular work.

Inquiry among construction firms in Montreal shows a similar situation amongst building mechanics More than 25 per cent of the skilled artisans have passed from the industry in the past five years, it was estimated, while many men have been idle so long that it is feared they have lost their skill. It might be necessary, when demand for building materials becomes normal and obsolete machinery has to be replaced that skilled labor will have to be imported from Great Britain ani Europe in order to meet this demand, it was thought by some industrialists.

Howard Sees Prosperity Without War In America

of the Kingfish.

"Now, with Huey gone, and no one on the field to take his place or to lead his following, there is removed the necessity for the administration to foster 'left wing' legislation."

Turning to the field of international affairs and prospect of war, Mr. Howard expressed opinion that there was no necessity for the United States being drawn into a general European war if one results from current disturbances.

"The time to keep out of war," Mr. Howard said, "is before the war starts.

"Neutrality legislation effected at the last session of congress was certainly a step in the right direction.

"But I believe it should be strengthened. I believe one of the first concerns of the next session should be a careful analysis of America's status and a more binding stand which will emphatically keep us from being involved in European war."

Mr. Howard, chairman of the board of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, wrote the president on August 26 as follows:

"As an independent editor keenly interested in the objectives of the New Deal, I have been seeking the reason for the doubts and uncertainties of those businessmen who are skeptics, critics and outright opponents of your program at a time when there is no commensurate dissatisfaction evidenced by others of the electorate.

"I do not accept as fact that interests of what we broadly term business are in conflict with mass interests. I expect to continue in support of your stated interpretation of American liberalism — not-withstanding my dissent and disagreement with some details and some theories.

In Constructive Spirit

"Therefore, it is in a friendly, and I hope constructive spirit, that I attempt a few observations and opinions I believe to be timely and pertinent . . . that certain elements of business have been growing more hostile to your administration is too obvious to be classed as news.

"As long as the hostility emanated from financial racketeers, public exploiters and sinister forces spanned by special privilege it was of slight importance. No crook loves a cop. But any experienced reporter will tell you that throughout the country many businessmen who once gave you sincere support now are not merely hostile, they are frightened.

"Many whose patriotism and sense of public service will compare with that of any of the men in public life are convinced:

"That you fatnered a tax bill that aims at revenge rather than revenue—revenge on business; that the administration sidestepped broadening the tax base to the extent necessary to approximate the needs of the situation; that there can be no real recovery until the fears of business are allayed through the granting of a breathing spell to industry and a recess from further experimentation until the country can recover from its losses.

Need To Undo Damage

"I know you have repeatedly stated your position on sections of the nation's problem but as an editor I know also of the necessity for repetition and reiteration. There is need to undo the damage done by misinterpreters of the New Deal. I know you feel as I do—that with all its faults and abuses it has developed our system in the past and enabled us to achieve greater mass progress than has been attained by any other system on earth.

"Smoke out the sinister forces seeking to delude the public into believing the orderly modernization of the system we want to preserve is revolution in disguise.

"Cordially and Sincerely,
"ROY W. HOWARD."

President Roosevelt replied to Mr Howard as follows:

"My dear Mr. Howard:

"I appreciate the tone and purpose of your letter. Fairness impels me to note with sympathy and understanding the facts you record, based on your observations as a reporter of opinion throughout the United States.

Confusion Promoted

"I can well realize, moreover, that many legislative details and processes incident to the long and arduous session of the congress should have had unavoidable effect in promoting some confusion in many peoples' minds. I think we can safely disregard the skeptics of whom you speak. Skeptics were present when Noah said it was going to rain. They refused to enter the ark.

"We can also disregard those actuated by a spirit of political partisanship or a willingness to gain and retain personal profit at expense or detriment to their neighbors. Then there were those who told us to do nothing. We heard of the do nothing policy before from the same sources and in many cases from the same individuals we heard it when Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson proposed reforms. The country has learned how to measure that kind of opposition.

"But there are critics who are honest and nonpartisan and who are willing to discuss and learn. I believe we owe therefore a positive duty to clarify our purpose, to describe our methods and reiterate our ideals. Such clarification is greatly aided by the efforts of those public spirited newspapers which serve the public well by a true portrayal of facts and unbiased printing of news. However, experience is the best teacher and results are the best evidence.

"As an essential outline of what has been done rises into view I am confident doubts and misapprehension will vanish. I am confident further that business as a whole will agree with you and with me that the interests of what we broadly term business are not in conflict with but wholly in harmony with the mass interests.

"I note what you say of hostility from 'financial racketeers, public exploiters and sinister forces' Such criticism is an honor to bear. . . . In the large depression it was culmination of unhealthy, however innocent, arrangements in agriculture, business and finance. Our legislation was remedial and as such it would serve no purpose to make any doctrinaire effort to distinguish between that addressed to recovery and that addressed to reform. The two . . . were inseparable.

A Wise Balance Needed

"Our actions were in conformity with the basic economic purposes set forth three years ago. . . . I pointed out it was necessary to seek a wise balance in American economic life, to restore the banking system to public confidence, to protect investors in the security market, to give labor freedom to organize and protection from exploitation, to safeguard and develop that national resources, to set up protection against the vicissitudes incident to old age and unemployment, to relief restitution, to relieve investors and consumers from the burden of unnecessary corporate machinery.

"I do not believe any responsible political party will dare go before the public in opposition to any of these major objectives. The tax program of which you speak is based upon a broad and just social and economic purpose.

"Such purpose was not to destroy wealth but to create a broader range of opportunity, to restrain the growth of unwholesome sterile accumulations, to lay the burden of government where it can best be carried.

"It affects only individuals with incomes over $50,000 yearly and individual estates of decendents having over $40,000. Moreover, it recognizes the generally accepted fact that largest corporations enjoying advantages of size over smaller corporations possess relatively greater capacity to pay . . . no reasonable person thinks this is going to destroy competent corporations or impair business as a whole.

Many Taxes Reduced

"Taxes on 95 per cent of the corporations were reduced by the new law. The small excess profits tax provided as well as the inter-corporate dividend tax should have wholesome effect in encouraging simplification of overly complicated and wasteful inter-corporate relationships.

"Congress declined to broaden the tax based because it was recognized the base had already been broadened to considerable extent in the past five years. I am aware sound arguments were advanced in favor of making every citizen pay income tax. England was cited as an example. But it should be recalled that despite complaints of higher taxes our interest payments on all public debts, including local government, require only 3 per cent of the national income as compared to 7 per cent in England.

"Broadening the tax base in the past few years has been very real . . . invisible taxes . . . fall relatively heavier upon the poor than the rich. In 1929, consumers' taxes were only 30 per cent of the national revenue; today they are 60 per cent, and even with the passage of the recent tax bill . . . will drop only 5 per cent

"The administration came into power pledged to a very considerable legislative program. It found the condition of the country to require drastic action. It seemed to congress and to me better to achieve these objectives expeditiously as possible in order that business and the public generally might know the modifications in conditions and rules of economic enterprise which were involved in our program.

Breathing Spell Here

"The basic program has now reached substantial completion and the breathing spell whereot you speak is here—very decidedly so.

"It is a source of great satisfaction that at this moment conditions are such as to offer further substantial and widespread recovery. Unemployment is still with us, but steadily diminishing and efforts to meet its problems are unflagging. I do not claim a magician's wand and I do not claim the government alone is responsible for definitely better circumstances. But we all know the very great effect of savings of banks, of farms, of homes, the building of public works, providing relief for the destitute and many other direct governmental acts for betterment of conditions.

"And we do claim to have helped public confidence which now offers a substantial foundation for recovery. I take it we are all not merely seeking, but getting recovery of confidence on the part of the mass of our population, in soundness of our economic life and in honesty and justice of the purpose of its economic rules and methods.

"I like the last sentence of your letter and repeat it . . . 'with all its faults and abuses it has developed our system in the past and has enabled us to achieve greater mass progress than has been attained by any other system on earth. Smoke out the sinister forces seeking to delude the public into believing that an orderly modernization of a system we want to preserve is revolution in disguise.'

"Very sincerely yours,
"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

$38,321 Gifts Prevent Chautauqua Foreclosure

Friends of Chautauqua Institution in New York State have saved it from foreclosure this Fall by contributing $38,321 in the last two weeks to enable it to meet bondholders' demands for $125,000 by Sept. 1, Samuel M. Hazlett, head of the Chautauqua Reconstruction Corporation, announced on August 31.

He explained, however, that the fight to wipe out the debts of the religious and educational institution was not over, since $75,000 would have to be paid to bondholders on April 1 next, and that in addition the institution had $100,000 in other debts, according to the New York Times.

This year it operated under receivership. With the Summer season not finished, officials announced today that the year was much more successful than any recent ones, with a gain in receipts over last year of $21,434.21.

SWIMMING CLUB ENDS SUCCESSFUL SEASON

The Committee meeting for the season 1935 of the Hachoji Swimming Club was recently held at the club house, Honmoku, Yokohama, with committee members, including Messrs M. Apcar, A Elked, J. Helm and Mrs. Elked, Hon. Secretary and Treasurer, attending.

At the session the committee decided to present to the members the audited accounts of the club for 1935 and to report the activity of that business for this season has successfully ended.

The report says that this is the sixth season the club has recorded since the great Earthquake. The Committee erected a very much improved and larger pier early in July with all its accessories.

The necessary arrangements were made early in June, and all sanitary arrangements were completed in good time. The Committee is grateful to the authorities, the local Fishermen's and Young Men's Associations, etc. for very efficient cooperation.

Great praise is due to the Police officer stationed in the district for promptly checking and arresting robbers, or recovering things lost through robbery. As usual the Young Men's Association has again mobilized quite a large force on Sundays to destroy rubbish etc. on the beach. The policy of the Committee in working in liaison with the villagers brought all the goodwill that could be desired.

The new guard fully met the club's requirements towards the safety of members, especially children, and also in doing his regular routine work as a carpenter. Later on a qualified Japanese Swimming teacher, a former Olympic star, offered his services practically free of charge; to him the thanks of the committee are due since great improvement has been made towards really good swimming and diving.

The actual season started very late indeed, due to abnormal weather conditions early in July when the pier was up, and closed around the 15th September, although from early June boxholders enjoyed some of the season in advance. Late in August the pier was partially destroyed, but thanks to certain members cost of new parts was saved.

On the 5th September almost all the remaining part of the pier was taken down, due again to threatening weather, whatever remains will be stored away for the winter as usual.

During the season counting from the date the pier was up, until the 15th September, the club registered 33 fine days, with very good attendance and excellent water conditions, 28 fair days, and 14 rainy or stormy days.

The Junior members of the club once more showed their interest in the club by organizing among themselves under the very able leadership of Mrs. C. Stillwell and Miss R. Apcar, and giving an exceedingly creditable performance of theatricals and dancing, very gracefully assisted by the well known Japanese families of Togo and Horikoshi, and this [illegible] the club a net profit of ¥78.32, after contributing ¥50 to the Ladies Benevolent Association of Yokohama. The success of the club sports followed by a tea party for the children was even greater than expected, and should henceforth be repeated every year.

As to social activities a Grand Sukiyaki party earning a net profit for the club of ¥82.11 should specially be mentioned.

Thanks are due to the Ladies' Auxiliary Committee, especially Mesdames G. Charlesworth, H. Elked, J. Helm and C. Stillwell for very great interest taken and their welcome support and hard work for the welfare of the club. During the season under review the club had 102 members (among them 59 ladies) and 61 Junior members and children.

Under the heading of donations, an additional income was secured to the club by a few of our friends, and to those the committee feel grateful indeed. The bathing boxes have almost all been taken this season.

Roosevelt Grants Big Sum To Arts

$27,315,217 Put At Disposal Of Hopkins Will Help Thirty Thousand

President Roosevelt on September 7 placed $27,315,217 at the disposal of Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, for one of the most extensive programs for subsidizing literature and the arts in the history of governments.

Approval of Controller General J. R. McCarl for the work relief allotment was given after a month's delay. The project, intended to provide six months' employment for more than 30,000 writers, painters, musicians and actors was to get under way the next week, according to the New York Times.

The Public Works Administration announced, coincidentally, that, with 5,500 applications on hand calling for allotment of a billion dollars, it had closed its books to further requests.

PWA Limit Believed Reached

Mr. Roosevelt had fixed Sept. 12 as the deadline for submitting applications in final form, but Secretary Ickes moved it up earlier to permit study of the proposals before the final meeting of the work relief allotment committee on September 17.

Informed circles saw virtually no more hope for the great majority of these applications. Mr. Hopkins already has rejected 2,000 PWA proposals, aggregating $335,000,000 on the ground that material costs were too high or that there was not a sufficient supply of local relief labor.

Although $900,000,000 was earmarked for local PWA projects, only $125,000,000 has been allotted so far, and barely that sum is expected to be added unless the President overrules Mr. Hopkins's rigid insistence upon low-cost projects similar to those of the Works Progress Administration.

Employment by Divisions

Bruce McClure, head of the WPA division of professional service projects, will direct activity in the arts-literature drive.

The four WPA divisions of the arts, their heads and the numbers they expect to employ are as follows:

MUSIC—Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff of Weston, Conn., 10,000, including 700 unskilled workers.

DRAMA—Miss Hallie Flanagan of Vassar College, 9,000 actors and 3,000 stage technicians.

ART—Holger Cahill of New York, 5,000 artists besides clerical assistants.

LITERATURE—Henry G. Absberg of Washington, D. C., 6,500 writers and other professional groups.

The chief activity of the writers will be the preparation of an American guide book, the first since 1909, which will be printed in five volumes covering the entire country and selling for "a nominal sum."

The writers also will aid in telling the story of the work relief program, will prepare an encyclopedia of government functions and will carry on a small number of research projects.

Music and Drama Objectives

The musicians and actors, in addition to giving performances, will attempt to develop more expert audiences by teaching appreciation in schools and elsewhere.

"The purpose of the drama program," said an announcement, "aside from giving employment to needy workers, will be to establish standards of theater production which will improve the skill of the artists and stimulate appreciation of the drama, and to develop methods by which the drama units may become self-supporting in whole or in part by providing entertainment to large audiences at low cost, through an educational and recreational program.

"Large units will be established in strategically located production centers, while medium-sized production units, built around fifteen or twenty actors, will be set up in other centers."

Similar employment had been provided for these professional groups under both the CWA and the old relief administration work program, but not on so comprehensive a scale. In addition, a large number of survey and census projects have been started for white-collar workers with no particular skill.

Pennsylvania Rejections

Amid conflicting reports concerning other parts of the work-relief program, it was learned today that the Works Progress Administration had rejected ninety-five Pennsylvania works projects to date, involving applications for $22,588,916.

Among the projects rejected were twelve armories, the proposed $5,400,000 internal revenue building at Harrisburg, a $1,560,000 hospital project at Allentown, a $2,467,271 hospital for Norristown, fifty-one school projects and twelve other hospital projects.

The majority of the projects were turned down because their "permanent-year" costs were considered excessive. However, in the case of thirty-four of those rejected, which were sponsored by Pennsylvania's new State Authority, public works officials have said that an attempt will be made to revise the individual applications to meet the requirements.

WPA Approval Paramount

Explaining the procedure involved, PWA officials reiterated that all applications for money from the $4,000,000,000 works fund must be approved by the Works Progress Administration whether they have PWA recommendations or not.

All the projects in the State Authority's $18,000,000 program, thirty-four of which were rejected by WPA yesterday, had been approved by the Public Works Administration and submitted to the Works Progress Administration in regular form. Only four were definitely approved for submission to the Advistory Committee on Allotments, which must pass on all proects before they go to the President, and six were listed as "in process," still having a chance for approval.

Meanwhile, PWA officials at Harrisburg were quoted as saying that the rejected projects in the State Authority's program had been submitted in virtual duplicate applications to the Works Progress and Public Yorks Administrations and indicated that they had been assured that the WPA application would be approved.

N.Y.K. Marks Its Golden Jubilee Today

midable ones than those the company has already overcome. But her 50 years' progress augur well for the future.

"When the next N.Y.K. Jubilee History comes to be written, much will have changed in the world of shipping. Doubtless many shipping companies will have been obliged to lower their house-flags for good. The N. Y. K. will not be among them, for the company is now an integral part of the Japanese Empire. In view therefore of the glorious history which the N.Y.K. can boast, has not the company the right to sing as follows in this its Golden Jubilee Year."

N. Y. K. Song

An English version of the company's song follows:

Let's hold our heads high through the long ages to come,
To wear the blue ribbon of Eastern Seas!
We're the proud N.Y.K. which exalts to the world
Nippon's might to which Meiji gave the keys.

The crimson lines on our virgin Yusen house-flag
Proud symbol of the mission we profess;
To serve the world's public is our honour and pledge;
In our wake let culture on earth progress!

Our far-flung "Maru" ships; our men on land and sea,
Swear to honour this trust the world bestows.
Then howe'er may rage the high seas of tomorrow,
The proud N.Y.K. will breast their billows.

Those Jubilee Stamps

Scene: Local post office in a fashionable English spa. Enter a tall and imposing-looking lady, who tenders to the clerk a shilling.

"If I purchase a shilling's worth of three ha'penny stamps, will you give me the old ones? I am traveling about, and the jubilee stamps take up so much room!"

Respect

"I notice you got up and gave a lady your seat in the subway," remarked an acquaintance.

"Yes," agreed the other. "Ever since childhood I have respected a woman with a strap in her hand."

Scientists Find Measuring Rod For Radicalism

Psychological Forum Told Of Questionnaire Used On 580 U.S. College Students

A measuring rod you can apply to yourself to learn whether you are at heart a radical or a conservative, Red or reactionary, was described to the American Psychological Association at Ann Arbor, Mich., on September 7 by Theodore F. Lentz, of Washington University, St. Louis.

It comprises several hundred selected and "weighted" questions, according to the New York Herald Tribune. Samples follow. "Yes" to such as these shows your tendency is radical:

1. Alimony for divorced husbands is as logical as alimony for divorced wives
2. The world needs a new region.
3. It was within the power of the diplomats of 1900 to 1912 to prevent the World War.
4. Something more effective than our present brooms and mops and vacuum cleaners should be devised to clean our homes.
5. One-fifth of the public school budget could well be spent in educating parents to educate their children

Conservatives in This Row

Conservative if you answer "Yes" to these:

1. It is bad for a married man to take another man's wife to the theater.
2. Billy Sunday has done much to make religion a vital force in our lives.
3. Not all international disputes should be settled by arbitration.
4. Women in general are not as intelligent as men.
5. College education is right in more ways than it is wrong.

The testing method was tried on 580 college students. With full statistical analysis, the experimenter found that it shows radicalism and conservatism are matters of degree rather than kind. Also that it is very difficult to devise a measurement which does not unduly influence the findings in these human problems.

War and Peace Propaganda

An idea of currents of war and anti-war and radicalism running on college campuses was given by E. Lowell Kelly, of the Connecticut State College. The effects of an anti-war meeting on the campus extended widely beyond those who attended. The meeting caused the participants to become slightly more anti-war than before. But those who did not attend the meeting afterward were somewhat less against war. The meeting, he explained, received much discussion about the campus.

These findings were based only on students whose opinions it was possible to measure carefully three times —first, before the anti-war meeting; second, at the time of the meeting, and, third, some time afterward. The split showed in the third measurement. All these students were opposed to war on general principles, and the measurements showed either mildness or violence of this opposition.

Men the More Conservative

Between the sexes Dr. Kelly found no essential difference on the war issue. On other subjects the men were somewhat more opposed than the women to both socialism and communism.

The students who attended the antiwar meeting, and who opposed war most strongly, were very strongly opposed to militarism and much more in favor of divorce than those less against war.

The anti-war students, as compared with those less against war, were less favorable to capital punishment, less favorable to the church, more in favor of birth control, less favorable to marriage, more for socialism and more for communism.

Except divorce and militarism, these differences were mostly small.

Gland Extract Aids Reading

The use of medicine to improve the elementary study of reading—an extract given by the doctor instead of a lesson by the teacher—is one of the surprising new developments of science reported to the association. Scores of these cases were described by Dr. Florence Mateer, director of the Merryheart School at Columbus, Ohio.

Most of them were healthy children in outward appearance, but encountered difficulties in learning to read. Study didn't help much—sometimes made them worse. Puzzled, the Merryheart women psychologists collaborated with the medical men, and discovered that in about half of the cases the cause was not lack of mental ability, but glands.

All these children, about 100, suffered from insufficient secretion by their pituitary glands. Given pituitary extracts by physicians, their reading handicaps disappeared and they shot ahead in classes, making up for lost time.

U.S. Spenders Abroad Rouse Ire Of Gerard

Says Barbara Hutton And Her Like Aid Red Cause, Inspire Taxes On Wealth

James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany, returned from Europe on September 7 aboard the Italian liner Conte di Savoia and in a halfhour interview set forth his opinions on Benito Mussolini, what might happen if Italy were not permitted to work out her destiny in Ethiopia, the disgusting sums of money Americans spent in foreign lands, and why the former Barbara Hutton was a "Communist agitator." To the latter subject he devoted the most attention.

The name of Miss Hutton, now the Countess Haugwitz-Reventlow, arose when some one asked Mr. Gerard whether he had ever prepared a new edition of his celebrated list, announced in 1930, of the sixty-four men whom he considered the true rulers of the United States, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

"No, I haven't" smiled Mr. Gerard, "but Gene Howe, an editor in Amarillo, Tex., has adopted my idea by naming the most influential people in the country. This year he said Barbara Hutton Mdivani Haugwitz-Reventlow had the most influence. And he's right!' There's an expressionless young woman who inherited $50,000,000, and now rushes about gathering titles, good or bad, with the speed of the antelope. She does her country no good and spends her money abroad.

"The result is a strong tax-the-rich sentiment that we're all going to suffer from if we've piled up a little money. She and others of her type have caused that feeling, and their actions serve as good propaganda for the Communists, too."

Tourist Spending Makes Him "Sick"

Mr. Gerard, the chairman of the Committee on America Self-Contained, already had expressed his opinion of the heavy flow of money from American tourists' pockets into foreign hands. He didn't mince words about it.

"It makes me sick to see the money spent abroad by Americans," Mr. Gerard said, bluntly. "In 1928 the total spent by tourists and American residents in foreign countries amounted to $720,000,000. Even last year they spent $300,000,000 abroad. And we have this business of giving money away. The Eastman people are building expensive dental clinics all over Europe—Stockholm, Paris, Rome. I say, let the French take care of their own teeth. We've spent millions on hospitals and rebuilding ruined towns. A lot of our people think we did about enough while that war was on. Perhaps the hospitals are needed, but we don't see any one coming over here to build hospitals in Arkansas, do we?

"Most European nations strictly limit the amount of money that can be taken out of the country. I certainly think we need a limit or a tax on money taken out to be spent abroad. Wouldn't $300,000,000 have helped a lot if spent here last year? The English people stayed home, bought British and generally 'got together' in pulling out of their slump. London was the gayest place I've seen in fifteen years."

Says Duce Is Not Bluffing

Mr. Gerard added a finishing blow to the oft-denied report that his recent visit with Benito Mussolini had been undertaken at the request of the State Department.

Mr. Gerard's description of the affair showed that he had been treated to a typically ceremonious reception by Il Duce.

"I will say this much—he is a man of great determination, who will carry through what he starts. Any one who thinks he is bluffing is very much mistaken. And his people are behind him, down to the smallest boy."

A reporter asked whether any concessions could turn the Italian ruler from his apparent purpose of waging a campaign in Ethiopia. Mr. Gerard thought it over, and shook his head dubiously.

part of Kansu and that, as a result, all the foreign missionaries stationed in that part of the province have withdrawn to Lanchow, the capital of the province. The Communists are believed to be part of the Red Army which recently retired from Szechwan Province.

Chinese reports received here this morning state that the Communist troops under Liu Chih-tan and Hsu Hai-tung are also threatening to push their drive into Suiyuan Province, as the outcome of a successful offensive launched against them by Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang. General Fu is said to be conferring with General Wang Tsing-kou, commander of the provincial troops, regarding the defense measures to be taken against the Reds.

The reported Communist movements are taken in military and political circles here as indirect confirmation of the rumor that General Chiang Kai-shek, chairman of the National Military Council, is planning to drive the Communist troops out of Central and Western China into the northern provinces, where his influence has considerably weakened

The creation of political tension between Prince Teh and General Fu was envisaged by observers here yesterday when it was revealed that the General had entered into an alliance with Prince Shieh, of the Sikung Banner, who was recently expelled from the Mongolian Autonomy Commission.

It is reported that the troops under the command of Prince Teh, augmented by the forces of the allied Inner Mongolian chiefs, are concentrated at Huntepien-miao and that they are faced by the provincial forces of Suiyuan under General Wang Cheng-kuo, commander of the 70th Division. The latter forces are stationed at Aar and Tengchao, along the Yellow River.

Informed circles are of the opinion that in the event of an outbreak of hostilities that Mongolian Autonomy Commission will launch a campaign to secure complete independence for Inner Mongolia.

It is understood that an attempt to ameliorate the differences between Prince Teh and Prince Shieh has been made by the Nanking Government, which sent Mr. Pei-lien, vice-chairman of the Mongolian-Tibetan Affairs Commission, to Inner Mongolia. A flat rejection of any conciliation proposal which might be offered by the Nanking Government is reported to have been the answer to Mr. Chao's efforts from both of the disputants. The Central Government intermediary left for Nanking yesterday.

The de facto Inner Mongolia Government, in a statement issued today, has declared that the resopnsibility for any untoward incidents which may occur on the Suiyuan-Mongolian border should rest entirely on the shoulders of Suiyuan authorities.

It is understood that the Suiyuan provincial authorities are rushing reenforcements to the border. Their equipment reportedly includes heavy guns, machine-guns and armored cars. All strategic points are hurriedly being occupied.

HENRY W. KINNEY ON SHANGHAI VISIT

Mr. Henry W. Kinney, who is well known in Tokyo, recently has visited in Shanghai. The following sketch in the North China Daily News on Mr. Kinney will be of interest to his friends here:

Mr. Henry W. Kinney who has been paying one of his periodical visits to Shanghai returns tomorrow to Dairen. It is understood that he may not be here again. In a few weeks' time he is expecting to retire from his post with the South Manchurian Railway Company. He then proposes to take a trip to his own country and from the United States of America to make for Tahiti where he has acquired an estate for residence in retirement. Mr. Kinney is a journalist who for many years past has been the press liaison officer of the South Manchurian Railway. In that capacity he has rendered yeoman service to his company and has made many friends among journalists of all nationalities. His knowledge of Manchuria is unrivalled and his indefatigable labor in imparting it to the inquiring correspondents has been admirable. In recent years his responsibilities have been heavy and delicate—he paid an important visit to Geneva during the time that the fate of Manchuria was under discussion there—but he has managed to preserve an equable courtesy and to fulfil his primary duties without losing the respect of those whose views may, in some respects, have differed from the policy which he so efficiently and effectively expounded. It is characteristic of him that, for the purposes of retirement, he should select the beautiful island of Tahiti where he can forget the trials of a newspaper-ridden world and cultivate his love of nature and the simple life under ideal conditions. He runs only one risk. His friends are so numerous and will miss him so much that they may decide to penetrate the remoteness of that ocean retreat in order once more to exchange with him impressions of world politics and refresh themselves with his reminiscences.

Socialists' Rebuff To Reds Extolled

Leaders Of Party In N.Y. Hail Defeat Of Move At Brussels To Aid Communists

American Socialists expressed gratification recently over reports from Brussels that the executive committee of the Labor and Socialist International had defeated a move by the French delegates to have the organization effect contact with the Communist International.

Representative New York Socialists said the defeat of the proposal indicated that the policy of no dealings with the Communists remained unchanged despite the "united front" campaign started by the Communists at the recent congress of the Third International in Moscow, according to the New York Times.

Alexander Kahn, American Socialist observer at the Brussels meeting, said in cable messages to Socialist leaders in New York City that the executive committee of the Labor and Socialist International had decided to instruct Frederich Adler, its secretary, to examine the official declaration of the recent Communist Congress to determine what changes in policy had been made.

Socialists in Gotham understood that British, Czechoslovak, Dutch, Belgian and Scandinavian members of the executive committee had expressed their opposition to any united front with the Communists on the ground that the proposals had not been made in good faith.

Sees Stand Here Vindicated

"We are gratified to learn that the position to which the American socialists have adhered from the very beginning—that there can be no basis for cooperative action between Socialists and Communists in this country—has been sustained by the executive committee of the Labor and Socialist International at its meeting in Brussels," said Louis Waldman, New York State chairman of the Socialist party.

"The action taken reflects the unchanged sentiment of the most powerful of the Socialist and Labor parties of the world.

"This action follows close on the heels of a new drive which the Moscow International and the American Communists have launched to bring about what they claim would be a united front against the menace of fascism which, they say, is threatening democratic institutions and ideals, for the preservation of which they are now summoning all democratic-loving elements, including the bourgeoisie.

"Friends of democracy will be pardoned if they will view with suspicion and distrust these latest converts to democracy. It is in Russia, where the Communists have been in unchallenged control since 1917, that democracy received its first major blow, and the idea of dictatorship, which the Fascists inherited from the Communists, was enthroned."

Mr. Waldman charged that the Communists had destroyed elementary civil and political liberties in Russia, had furnished justification and much of the support for the trend to fascism, had preferred to see Hitler win over the Social Democrats in Germany, and had endeavored to destroy the labor movement "by their persistent and vicious campaign of slander and vituperation and their irresponsible attacks on every attempt labor has made to advance its position.

Link to Fascism Charged

"The Communists have sought to leave the labor movement impotent in the face of a growing Fascist sentiment," Mr. Waldman continued. "In some places, as in Germany and Austria, they succeeded in paralyzing the labor movement sufficiently to insure the victory of fascism.

"In other places, like Great Britain and the United States, the labor movement took the precautions that have prevented the Communists from exercising any influence.

"The Communists and Fascists have much in common. They have collaborated on many occasions. So far as the Socialists are concerned, they prefer to stand with the labor movement.

"If the Communists wish to convince the labor movement that their conversion to democracy is not merely another maneuver designed for the purpose of dividing and weakening the labor forces, and that their plea for a united front is not just another scheme to divert the Socialists from the worth-while tasks upon which they are engaged, they will give evidence of this change of heart by establishing civil and political liberty in Russia before they undertake to defend it in other parts of the world.

"They could begin by releasing the thousands of men and women who have paid for their devotion to democratic ideals by prison terms."

Dancing Season Begins With Jusuke's Recital

was danced to Utazawa music and song.

Ghost from Hanamichi

One of the most ambitious efforts of the program was "Masakado", in which a ghostly courtesan appeared out of a trap door in the hanamichi, and attempted to ensnare a warrior.

The greatest variety of movement and expression characterised the different dances, and yet judged by the quickened life of the present day, the tempo of some of the pieces were painfully slow. The dance minutia constantly repeated becomes tedious. There are dramatic situations in odori, but in general the movement is on the level without change, and the ending inconclusive. Much of the traditional Kabuki odori is stereotyped and needs to be recreated and revivified, if it is to compete with the feverish activity of jazz.

Judging, howwever, from the overwhelming and extraordinary interest taken in the dance at present, not only by the traditional odori but the new styles that are being created, some striking developments in the dance world will not be long delayed.

India Sends 30,000 To War In North

Troops Prepare For The First Drive Into Mohmand Territory Of Kamali

Thirty thousand British Indian troops from Peshawar, Nowshera, Jhelum and Rawal Pindi have concentrated along Gandab Road as a preliminary to advancing across Nahakki Pass and entering the Mohmand territory of Kamali, into which British Indian soldiers never before have entered.

Hostile tribes of the Upper Mohmand country, including the Safis and other disaffected clansmen, have already been cleared from the road, which winds through a low ridge of barren hills twenty-five miles north of Peshawar, according to a despatch from that city dated Sept. 15 appearing in the New York Times. These hills and those beyond are now picketed by advancing infantry.

The large number of troops required to maintain the long line of communications accounts for the size of the force involved in these operations. Only a small proportion of the troops is likely to be in direct contact with the hostile tribesmen.

Tribesmen Ready for Battle

About 1,500 tribesmen are in position beyond Nahakki Ridge, spread across a nine-mile front between Khazana Sar and Khapak Kandao and larger forces are within call in the Kamali villages. The tribesmen appear to be keeping together in view of the threat to enter Kamali territory.

The general situation is marked by uncertain factors. The Haji of Turangzai and his son may now realize the authorities mean business. Warning has been given the tribesmen of the British intentions.

Contrary to custom in normal military campaigns they have been told the nature of the British objective in a proclamation which the Governor of the Northwest Frontier Province, Sir Ralph Griffiths, has caused to be distributed in their territory. After pointing out that the troops will advance to Kamali whether the Mohmands resist or not, the Governor emphasized his intention by quoting the Pushtu proverb, "Dawn will come even if the cock doesn't crow."

The hostile tribesmen must be aware of the comprehensive preparations for the campaign. They know that the road, which now ends at Yusuf Khel, will be carried forward to enable the troops to advance into Kamali. Their rear guard doubtless realizes that a large perimeter camp, similar to those which were common among the ancient Romans, has been thrown up across the minor bridge at Ghalanai and occupied by the brigades.

The troops in this camp are installed in tents, with floors sunk into the earth to protect the men from sniping from surrounding hills. At Katsai another brigade is in position, while the Jhelum and Rawal Pindi forces have replaced in Peshawar and Nowshera troops which now hold the advanced position.

Hope to Prevent Spread

Whether these elaborate preparations will deter the tribesmen from further hostile action remains to be seen. Every effort is being made to localize the campaign and keep it within the limits necessary for the objective in view.

Troops have already advanced beyond the territory of Isa Khel and Burham Khel, who were hostile in the early days of the present troubles, after engagements of some significance. There also has been disaffection elsewhere in the Moslem north.

From Dir to Lahore the Moslems have been chafing under a variety of grievances. The tribes between the Indian and Afghan borders owe dubious allegiance to both countries. It might take little to arouse a Jehad (holy war) along the border.

The traveler between Peshawar and Ghalanai is faced with an unusual sight. The recently constructed Gandad Road is filled with army trucks conveying troops, food and water to advanced posts.

Buffalo Bill

In 1860 Buffalo Bill (William Cody) was a Pony Express rider, assigned to a 75-mile route of rugged country between Red Butte on the North Platte River and Three Crossings of the Sweetwater. Riding into his terminal one day at the end of his 75 miles trip, Cody found that his relief rider was dead and that there was no one to cover the next 85 miles to Rocky Ridge. "The Mail Must go on." Cody decided to continue to Rocky Ridge, where he turned back, riding a double route once more, to arrive at Red Butte on schedule time. The distance covered, 320 miles in 21 hours, 40 minutes, is considered by historians to constitute a Pony Express record.

Not Bad

An older farmer was moodily regarding the ravages of the flood.

"Hiram," yelled a neighbor, "your pigs were all washed down the creek."

"How about Flaherty's pigs?" asked the farmer.

"They're gone, too."

"And Larsen's?"

"Yes."

"Humph!" ejaculated the farmer cheering up. "Tain't as bad as I thought."—Atlanta Constitution.

Club Entertains Australian Girls

British Ambassador And Visitors Are Pan-Pacific Luncheon Speakers

Sir Robert and Lady Clive and the 30 Australian girls who are now visiting Japan were honor guests at the Pan Pacific club's luncheon at the Imperial hotel Friday noon.

Viscount Inouye in welcoming the British Ambassador recalled the long-existing friendship between Japan and Great Britain. The British Ambassador replied in part:

"We have no alliance today, yet the feelings between Japan and the British Empire are unquestionably friendly, and sincerely friendly. But, as the name of this Club indicates, it concerns itself more with what happens in the Pacific, and as the name implies, we hope that it will remain pacific."

Mr. A. J. Girdwood, who is accompanying the Australian girls, said:

"The last fortnight has only been a stepping off place for a wonderful time in Japan. We have been here 2 weeks, and hope before we leave to make many friendships and create further good feeling between our own country and Japan.

"Our organization, the young Australia League, conducts tours to different parts of the world. Formerly we were a boys' organization which conducted tours throughout Australia, and to England and the United States and various other countries, but in the last few years the girls began to think that they should be given the same advantage as the boys, and we launched out on tours throughout our own country. Last year and this year we thought of taking a party of girls overseas, and we began with Japan because Japan is the nearest neighbor, and we wish to foster friendly relations between our neighbors in the Pacific. We feel that there should be peace among the people in the Pacific, and we from Australia have the greatest desire to be good friends with Japan."

Other speakers among the Australian girls endorsed what Mr. Girdwood said of the pleasures they have had in Japan. They left Tokyo today for a four weeks trip to Japan's beauty spots.

BROADCAST ON BIBLES

Secretary of State Cordell Hull will go on the air from New York at 1:30 p.m. Sunday, speaking in place of President Roosevelt who is on his western tour, in celebration of the Fourth Centenary of the publication of the first English Bible. In 1535 Mile Coverdale followed Tyndale's great version of the New Testament with the first complete version of the Bible ever attempted in the English language. He seems to have done the work entirely unaided, and his Bible immediately went into common use. To this day his version of the Psalms is current in the Book of Common Prayer of the Anglican church. The Coverdale Bible was valuable source of material in the preparation of the King James Version of 1611, and many of its finest phrasings are his work. The place this early Bible had in the standardizing of the common speech and in the formation of true patterns of English style, as well as in the bringing of religious education within the range of the ordinary man in England is beyond computation. In both England and America celebrations of this four hundredth anniversary are being held. The broadcast will be on short wave length, and making allowance for time difference will be received here at 11:30 p.m. today, according to the Tokyo Branch of the American Bible Society.

Kremlin Places Ruling Party In Minor Position

Few Leaders Center Power In Own Hands; Trend Marked Since '35

Political reorganization of far-reaching importance is now occurring in Soviet Russia, with the significance of a series of changes which began early in 1934 just now becoming apparent as the highly centralized state is becoming supreme, and the ruling Communist Party is being deflated.

Absolute power is being centered more than ever in the hands of a few men in the Kremlin, according to a staff correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor in Moscow.

The first move in this direction was made at the seventeenth Party Congress in January, 1934. Until that time the Communist Party had been supreme in Russia, exercising its dictatorship behind the screen of the Soviet Government. But the Congress approved changes which brought the ruling party from behind its screen. A few simple devices welded party and government into one supreme centralized state.

Playing Party Down

Observers at that time were uncertain about the Kremlin's intentions. Some thought that the Communist Party was to be strengthened, and openly assume the dictatorship. But a series of important articles which later appeared in the official press disclosed that the Kremlin was interested in strengthening the state, not the party. These articles emphasized the importance of a powerful state during that unpredictable period until "world revolution" brought Socialist dictatorship to all countries.

After this idea had been thoroughly expounded, party philosophers began this spring to develop a new line of thought. They detected a new phase in Russia's political evolution, in which the Communist Party would play a less important part. With the approach of "classless society," they explained, the distinction between Communist and non-Communist has become less pronounced. The Communists were an instrument to guide the socialized state through its difficult preliminary stages, but now that stabilization has been achieved, the Communists become merely one of several groups supporting the supreme state.

Non-Communist Bolsheviks

This argument has been carried to its logical conclusion by the Communist Party newspaper Pravda, in an editorial entitled, "Communist and non-Communist Bolsheviks." This is a new use of the word "Bolshevik," which always has been the official designation for the Russian Communist Party. "Non-Communist Bolshevik" appears to be a contradiction in terms.

But Pravda explained. "Our party numbers only 2,500,000 members (and candidates). But Bolsheviks feelings inspire millions of other Soviet citizens. Non-Communist Bolheviks are those whose love of their fatherland is unlimited, who are ready to die for their country. . . . We must not fence off these non-Communist Bolsheviks from Communist Bloshevik, as both are inspired by the same feelings." The only difference, said Pravda, is that Communist Bolsheviks usually have a "higher level of political consciousness, a deeper understanding of the final aims of Communism."

Philosophical arguments of this sort always are used to support any changes which the Kremlin makes, either before or after the event. Practical measures to deflate the ruling Communist Party had been set in motion before the theoreticians, explained what was being done.

Party Sympathizers

A new category of "Party sympathizers" was created last year, men and women who are given almost equal privileges and powers with Communists without joining the party. During recent months an unusual number of party members has been expelled, and the official press has become increasingly critical of the leadership of lower party organs. Joseph Stalin, virtual dictator, denounced "conceited Communists, so proud of party membership that they do not permit non-party people to approach them."

The movement reached a climax in May, when the Kremlin dissolved the Society of Old Bolsheviks, an organization of Communist veterans with at least 15 years of active party service. No official reason was given, but members of this society had been permitted unusual freedom of speech, which some of them exercised to criticize Kremlin policies.

They had the right of assembly, and were a potential source of opposition.

All of these actions, supported by theoretical arguments, have had unmistakable practical results. The position of the small ruling group in the Kremlin has been strengthened, and power centered more absolutely in their hands.

Savants Puzzle Over New Flares Of Star

tronomers still offer no explanation of why these flareups occur.

Menzel's Heat Data

Another whose work is helping to fill a great gap in astronomy is Dr. Donald Menzel, staff member of the Harvard College Observatory, who reported at today's meetings on his most recent work in identifying temperatures higher than any known before.

These he measured in planetary nebulae, where results showed temperatures as high as 100,000 degrees, Absolute. Planetary nebulae are clouds of gaseous matter in either ring or disk shape with a very hot star in the center. The nature and temperature of such stars has been a question of uncertainty for many years. The problems involved are among the most recent tackled.

A method for calculating the temperatures of such stars was developed by Dr. H. Zanstra, but while recognition was given to certain minimum values, his results were so high they were temporarily set aside for future investigation.

Dr. Menzel's work shows that the actual temperatures must be much higher than Dr. Zanstra figured. Two years ago Dr. Menzel and two others identified neon among planetary nebulae. Since then doubly, triply and quadruply ionized neon was found.

Quadruply ionized neon is neon lacking four of its 10 normal electrons. Such a neon atom, to be found in this condition, must undergo temperatures of 100,000 degrees Absolute.

Of course such temperatures as these are observed on the exteriors of stars. No one knows yet what temperatures will someday be found inside stars. However, Dr. Menzel told The Christian Science Monitor he believed 10,000,000 degrees Absolute would not be uncommon, and perhaps some might go as high as 1,000,000,000 degrees Absolute.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Dodo

The Dodo or Simpleton Bird was a gigantic pigeon larger than a turkey and was particularly plentiful on the island of Mauritius and Reunion. It was unable to fly due to atrophied wings, and could run but slowly. The birds were so abundant that people became satiated with their flesh, and began to kill them wantonly. The dodoes used to swallow pebbles and stones. These stones, greatly sought for as knife sharpeners, contributed to their complete extermination by sailors. The dodo has been extinct since 1681.

Star-blast Riddle Nearing Solution

Cause Of Explosions, A Great Astronomical Puzzle, Is Being Penetrated

The terrific stellar explosion that revealed a nova or "new" star in the constellation Hercules last Winter was declared in Norwich, England on Sept. 10 to have been perhaps the most important from the scientific standpoint of any of these mighty convulsions studied in modern times.

After almost ten months of constant observation of this new star, astronomers continue to find its behavior so unusual that, according to those who addressed the British Association for the Advancement of Science it may disclose the causes of such explosions and thus clear up one of the greatest riddles of astronomy, according to Ferdinand Kuhn Jr., in the New York Times.

How can a star normally about the size of our sun be blown within a day or two into a white hot mass 100,000 times its former size? What titanic force throws off its gaseous shell and sweeps it outward through space at 1,000 miles or more per second?

Ever since the days of Tycho Brahe, the great Danish astronomer of the sixteenth century, scientists have watched so-called new stars flare up in the sky and have wondered what the cause might be. But the mystery may be solved soon, Professor Frederick J. M. Stratton of Cambridge University suggested today, for this new star, "Nova Herculis," has been unlike any other and has been observed more closely than any of its predecessors.

"Altogether, it has been a most satisfactory nova," said J. P. Prentice, the young amateur astronomer who first discovered it from Stowmarket, near here, on a frosty night last December. And some of the foremost professional watchers of the sky, including Dr. H. Spencer-Jones, the Astronomer Royal agreed wholeheartedly with him.

Photographs Made Early

For one thing, Nova Herculis is the first new star whose spectrum was photographed on the same night it was discovered and before the star reached its most intense brightness. For another, it was slower than most other new stars in flaring up.

Moreover, its gas shell behaved peculiarly in its outward flight, moving first about 200 miles a second, then slowing down in the first week to 100, then speeding up again to 270. At this stage came a second outburst of gas, at a speed of almost 600 miles a second.

"In the spectrum of a star," said Dr. Stratton, "the light is analyzed so the atoms present in the star's atmosphere can make their mark and reveal their presence. In the case of a nova spectrum the light is constantly changing as successive sets of atoms come into prominence.

"Thus, in the latest nova on the morning of its discovery hydrogen oxygen, nitrogen and carbon were present. The next night only hydrogen, magnesium, calcium and iron were found. Then the spectrum became more complex and many other elements, notably titanium, came into the picture. Evidence also was found for the presence of molecules of such gases as cyanogen.

"At present, the nova is still brightening, while going through its later stage, and it is changing in a more leisurely way than most novae. From these unusual conditions, we may hope that considerable more light will be thrown on the physical processes accompanying the development of a nova, and perhaps—arguing back—we may get more light on the cause of the initial outburst."

Star Is Really Old

Dr. Spencer-Jones reminded his hearers that the nova is not really a new star, but is a mere old star that experiences a sudden flare-up in brightness and then fades.

"Even though these new stars, to the naked eye, are rare and spasmodic phenomena," said Dr. Spencer-Jones, "we must consider this rightly an occurrence in the history of every star. Assuming that there are thirty new stars in every nebula, we can estimate that in 3,000 million years, every star will have been a nova, and this is about the age of our own galactic system."

Dr. Spencer-Jones recalled Professor E. A. Milne's theory that every star undergoes a period of instability and breaks up. In the last two novae, he said, break-ups have been observed, although it has not yet been determined whether they were real or only apparent.

Mr. Prentice, who is a lawyer by profession, said there had been forty-one new stars in our own galactic system between 1901 and 1925, although only six were discovered soon enough to permit spectroscopic observations to be taken. All six, he proudly recalled, were discovered by amateur astronomers, five of them by British subjects.

Telling the story of his discovery, Mr. Prentice said he had spent the night watching meteor showers until at 4:30 o'clock in the morning he sleepily left his telescope for a walk in the cold air. Suddenly, on looking over his shoulder, he noticed a new star in Hercules, where none had been before.

Certain that what he had seen was a nova, he jumped into his car, sped into Stowmarket and telephoned the Greenwich Observatory at 5 o'clock. The young observer on night duty there instantly realized the importance of the news and interrupted other work to take spectrograms of the new star.

Records on Spectrograms

Thus long before the star reached maximum brilliance, the progress of the explosion thousands of light-years away had been recorded on spectrograms and analyzed for the benefit of astronomers all over the world.

Addressing the zoology section, Professor James Ritchie of Aberdeen attempted to explode the belief that a special "migratory instinct" enabled great herds of animals like the buffaloes of the North American Plains to wander hundreds of miles each year and return to their old stamping grounds. The great migrations of the past, he said, were seasonal, determined mainly by the scarcity of food, water or salt.

"The migrations themselves followed definite routes, so the face of the country was scarred by beaten tracks," said Dr. Ritchie. "In the case of American bison, these tracks survived long after the herds themselves had disappeared.

"These roads were planned, probably step by step, by trial and error, and they formed a real heritage handed down from generation to generation. If I am right in thinking the beaten track is of fundamental importance in mammal migration, then there is no need to invoke a special sense direction or migratory instinct to explain these great seasonal movements."

Illuminated roads on which there would be no need for automobile headlights were envisaged by A. V. Robinson, Deputy Secretary of the Ministry of Transport, during a discussion of road accidents.

"It may be," he said, "that on all the more intensely traveled roads there will be no occasion for the use of lights on a vehicle. The approaching driver will see the oncoming vehicle not as a couple of spots of dazzling lights against a black background, but as a dark silhouette against an adequately illuminated background."

members. Their aim, he said is to prevent youth from disillusionment, as youth, freed from old-time traditions, is the most valuable element of the movement. There is an increase in interest, and this interest will be raised even higher in the future, the Rev. Mr. Kelly said, as the objective of the next year's campaign is: "Win over youth."

Plans and preachers are, he declared, prepared for the work, which includes a well-prepared peace movement.

AT DINNER PARTY

Mr. Roy W. Howard, chairman of the board of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, Mrs. Howard and their daughter, Miss Jane Howard, were guests of honor at a delightful buffet dinner party given by Mr. and Mrs. Ray G. Marshall Monday evening.

Mrs. Howard wore a stunning gown of black and white silk with a black chiffon collar and Miss Howard a smart black and white check taffeta and a bracelet which she had bought in Tokyo previously that day. Mrs. Howard was delighted to receive from one of the guests whom she has known for a long time, a white silk furoshiki with the front page and an advertising section of a New York newspaper stamped on the one side. Mr. J. T. Mason had found the furoshiki in one of the Ginza department stores but none of the other Tokyo guests had seen one of its kind before.

The Marshalls' home was decorated with flower arrangements, the work of the hostess and the dinner included many special dishes which Mrs. Marshall had cooked.

Tokyo Women's Club Hears Review Of Plea For Peace

Convincing arguments for world peace and an internationalism transcending that talked of today were given in a review of A. A. Milne's book, "Peace With Honor" by Mrs. S. V. Davies at the opening fall meeting of the Tokyo Women's club at the Y.W.C.A. Monday afternoon.

Mrs. W. J. Davies, the new president, presided and greeted the many old and new members present. The new year books [illegible] ed. Mrs. H. B. Benninghoff gave a tribute to the late Dr. Rachel Read, active member of the club for 18 years. She recalled that Dr. Read had been a member of [illegible] committee 11 years and had served on other committees 13 years.

"Dr. Read enjoyed doing things for the club and enjoyed meeting with us. This was one of the strong characteristics of her life. . . She has left us a wonderful heritage by her example of what one can do with a life. . . ." Mrs. Benninghoff said.

Discussing "Peace With Honor," Mrs. Davies condensed in clear cut, emphatic manner Milne's arguments for world peace and quoted from his work. In his plea, Milne compared war to a dog fight in which the owners forgot which dog was theirs. He contended that war is silly and wicked and that its heart-breaking silliness was often more awful than its wickedness.

If the small group which declares war looked at war from the subjective point—if they had to personally undergo its tortures—there would be no war, Mr. Milne claimed.

He exploded the honor argument for war, declaring that no country has more honor than another. War he said was usually waged for economic reasons but youth must be emotionally aroused beyond reason. Honor, he continued, has come to mean that a nation achieve its ends regardless of the cost. We sing of dying for one's country but war isn't romantic, the writer continued. He spoke of the failure of Christianity to establish world peace, holding that many nations have used Christianity to advance war propaganda and to justify continued slaughter.

It is not enough to renounce aggressive war, we must renounce defensive war as well, the review continued. A defensive warship looks as offensive to the other side as an offensive ship. Neither side will own to aggression.

Reviewing Fascist doctrine, the review said that Mussolini believes that war brings out the noblest in man but this argument was also convincingly refuted.

Pleading for arbitration as a settlement for world problems, the writer said that it would be more honorable and dignified for the contented nations to yield something to the lesser countries for the sake of peace.

In past wars, the writer said that women and children were the first to be saved but in the next war, they will be the first to be sacrificed. It will be the dictators who will be saved.

The book ends with a strong argument for internationalism, greater than that which is talked about today. It is possible—the writer claimed. Ways of thinking change slowly. . . a peace that seemed impossible to our forefathers can be brought about today if every person in every country said, "There will be no more war." Milne relies on public opinion to bring about world peace. He does not advocate immediate disarmament but contends that it will come about gradually as the world becomes peace minded and a sense of trust developes between countries facing conflicting economic problems.

Public opinion, the review concluded, governs world activity. If it is strong enough for world peace, that will become as real as it is now idealistic.

HOSPITAL ANNOUNCEMENT

The Committee of the Yokohama General Hospital announce that an entire change of administration of the Hospital will take place on January 1st next. From that date the administration will be undertaken by the Franciscan Sisters of Mary, who have the nursing and general management of a large number of hospitals, not only in Europe, but also in the Far East and elsewhere, including the General Hospital at Shanghai (45 Sisters) and large hospitals in India, Ceylon and other Asiatic countries. They own and operate the Seibo International Hospital in Tokyo. They therefore have wide experience of Far Eastern conditions.

The new staff will comprise a Superintending Sister, two nursing Sisters, a lay nursing Sister and a Sister for house duties, also two Japanese trained nurses. Three of the European staff will shortly arrive from Europe, the other two Sisters coming from the Japan staff.

The Superintendent has been Superintendent of a clinic in France, and has had long experience in nursing and administration. She speaks fluent English. The lay nursing Sister, a native of Luxembourg, is also experienced and speaks English, French and German fluently.

The Committee feel that the new departure will add greatly to the efficiency of the Hospital, by ensuring that patients will receive skilled European nursing by an adequate and competent staff, and that the language difficulty inseparable from a Japanese nursing staff will be eliminated. Two of the Sisters will be conversant with Japanese, thus ensuring proper contact with the Japanese house staff.

The Committee take this opportunity to appeal once more for contributions to the Building Fund from members of the community who have not yet subscribed. While contributions are being steadily received, the general response has not been so prompt as had been hoped, and it is felt that there are many who intend to contribute to this most important project but who have not yet put their intention into effect. They have been greatly gratified at the generous sympathy shown by Japanese firms and individuals, whose contributions have already reached a total of ¥8,600.

It is recognised that in many cases foreign firms are awaiting authority from their Head Offices to contribute to the new building, and the Committee are confident that substantial donations will be received from this source, and that, with the further support for which they hope from the community, it will be possible to begin building operations by the end of this year. Funds available to date exceed ¥100,000, leaving about ¥ 40,000 still required to cover the cost of erection of the new Hospital as planned. They do not, however, feel justified in preparing detailed plans until the sum required is reasonably assured, and hope that by the end of the present month this assurance will be forthcoming.

The Committee do not propose to appeal this year for any donations for mantenance. All contributions will therefore be added to the Building Fund.

Contributions received to date are as follows:—

Hitler Warns All Nazis Are Mighty

sentative of its will."

The party organzation had undergone a thorough overhauling during the past year, Hitler announced, with the result that its effectiveness had been considerably enhanced. Not only had the administrative machinery been simplified, but the Special Guard and Storm Troop units had been reduced in membership, and the scrutiny to which they had been subjected had resulted in greater solidification of their ranks.

In its relations with the State the National Socialist movement has achieved "historically unprecedented success." "The Reich," the Chancellor announced, "has been forfeited in increasing measure to National Socialism.'

But his main tribute was to German rearmament.

On March 16, he said, by its own strength the National Socialist Government gave a German nation equality of rights. The establishment of our army gives Germany the necessary protection on land, and our air armament protects German land from fire and gas. The new German war fleet, fixed in its size by the London naval agreement, protects German commerce and the German coast."

He mentioned the vast "reforms" in all fields of legislation and administration and included in them the introduction of labor service conscription.

Bad Harvest in 1934 Admitted

Then, however, followed passages less triumphant because they pertained to the troubled field of economics. He admitted the harvest last year had been bad, setting aside previous impassioned denials by saying:

"Today we can speak about it."

This poor harvest is still a burden and has led to occasional shortages of certain foods, but the difficulty has been mastered, he asserted, adding "that unwarranted price increases have been prevented."

National Socialist economy, he said, is based on this principle—no wage increases and no price increases. Any other policy, he asserted, would lead to new inflation, and he warned that "conscienceless egoists or thoughtless dunderheads" trying to defeat this policy would be treated with "brutal ruthlessness."

At the same time he stressed anew determination to keep the mark stable and urged other countries to stabilize their currencies and do away with "prehistoric barter trade." Germany, he announced, was determined to make no new debts, in which connection he mentioned she had "considerably reduced her international indebtedness and obtained lower interest rates."

To obtain necessary food and raw material, he said, the government had tried to promote export trade and had succeeded, "despite the Jewish world boycott," in keeping German export losses on a level with those of other countries. And as far as material could not be obtained from abroad, he said, Germany was determined to produce her own material to make herself independent of foreign imports.

These domestic materials, he asserted, were not "ersatz" (substitute materials) but were just as good as foreign or entirely new materials. Among them he listed benzine from coal, textile fibers, artificial rubber, domestic oil and ore.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Giant Jersey Cabbages

Jersey, (one of the Channel Islands) which in the popular mind is associated with the expression Jersey Lily, has no lilies. Its characteristic curiosity is a species of giant cabbages 15 to 17 feet tall, which grows nowhere else. The cabbages resemble small date palms, and their stems are made into canes, to be sold as souvenirs to tourists and visitors.

British Foresee Italian Victories In First Battles

But Believe It Will Take Duce 4 Years Definitely To Conquer Ethiopians

The Italo-Ethiopian war may last four years, British military experts estimate. They believe the shooting will begin any day now, and that Premier Benito Mussolini's men will score impressive victories at the outset, wrote Mr. Joseph F. Driscoll to the New York Herald Tribune on September 14. The article follows:

For obvious imperial reasons, politicians here would like to see Italy stub her toe in Africa, but the British commentators concede that Italy will capture Adowa and Harar in the first few days and Addis Ababa sooner or later, perhaps in the first year. They say Italy's real problem will begin when she attempts to complete the conquest and to pacify and colonize.

Barring unforeseen developments, occupation of Adowa and Harar within the first week is conceded. About the same time Italy is expected to capture Ethiopia's contact with the outside world—a dinky railroad between Addis Ababa and Djibouti in French Somaliland.

Railroad First Target

One of the first objectives of the Italian drive will be to cut the Djibouti-Addis Ababa railroad at a point close to French and British Somalilands, thus preventing supplies from reaching Addis Ababa from the east—a feat which can be accomplished by motor transport forces dispatched from Walwal, 300 miles away

Emperor Haile Selassie probably will fight hard to save the railroad and Harar. Harar is his home province, and the Emperor will go there to command the defense.

At the head of this Italian army will be General Rodolfo Graziani, veteran fighter with vast colonial experience. He is expected to advance on Harar through one or all three valleys—the Fafan, Juba and Shibeli. The valleys are swampy and malarial; the Italians will be harassed by germs and the treacherous Ogaden Somalis.

Seek Adowa Revenge

The main offensive, undertaken from Eritrea, will attempt to wipe out the stain of Adowa, where the Ethiopians slaughtered the Italians in 1896. Starting from Asmara, Italy's troops must cross the Mareb River, which runs in a deep gorge. Once over, the Italians will advance on the greater part of the Ethiopian army, and merciless pitched battles are expected to be fought along the Aksum-Adigrat-Adowa line.

The Italians, under General Emilio de Bono, will be out to avenge the 1896 defeat, and the Ethiopians will be trying to repeat history. Brigadier General A. C. Temperley, military correspondent, says: "A combination of modern weapons, military training, discipline and high morale must insure complete success for the Italians, who are bound to inflict enormous losses on the Ethiopian masses."

Consolidation Next Step

After taking Adowa and Harar, the Italians are expected to consolidate their position before advancing too far. Addis Ababa is 400 miles from the Italian frontiers, and the Italians may not attempt to take the capital in the first grand rush. Instead, they may dig in north of the capital to wait out the next rainy season.

British experts believe Addis Ababa is bound to fall eventually, but loss of the capital will not be necessarily decisive. If the inland provinces remain loyal to Haile Selassie and carry on guerrilla warfare. Il Duce's generals will have their hands full for years. These provinces may receive munitions from neighboring Sudan and Kenya.

Italians' Hopes Better

Although British experts predict the war will last four years, the Italian general staff hopes to achieve a conquest in two years, and perhaps one. To succeed, the Italians must advance rapidly between now and next May, when another rainy season will begin, making campaigning impossible. Seven to eight months is the period in which Italy must defeat the Ethiopians if she is to achieve a cheap conquest. During the rainy season, too, disease will take its toll of the invaders. Also, the changing situation in Europe may require recall of the troops to the homeland.

Italy's great hope, as one expert phrases it, is that "A swift, decisive victory will be followed by wholesale surrender and formation of a strong native gendarmerie under Italian officers which, with a small army of occupation, will maintain order and pave the way for Italian colonization and exploitation of vast natural resources."

Ethiopians' Tactics

Experts agree that crushing defeat awaits the Ethiopians if they attempt to repel invasion by mass formation tactics, such as they used so successfully at the first battle of Adowa. On the other hand, if the Ethiopians fall back gracefully and lure the Italian armies far from the bases of supply, the invaders may be defeated by guerrilla warfare.

Although a long war is expected generally, early peace is not impossible. Victory at Adowa and occupation of Harar and Diredawa may satisfy the Italian sense of honor. In that event, Premier Mussolini may permit the League of Nations to arrange a compromise with Haile Selassie.

Collective Action For Peace Urged By Hoare

will, I know, be prepared to take their share in any collective attempt with a problem that is certainly to deal in a fair and effective way troubling many people at present and may trouble them even more in the future. Obviously, however, such an inquiry needs calm and dispassionate consideration, and is impossible in an atmosphere of war and threatenings of war.

I have now almost finished what I wished to say. I have tried to cover a wide field. But there is still one side of it, and a very important side, that I have not yet approached. Let me deal with it as clearly and definitely as I can before I sit down.

A Firm Stand

It has been not only suggested that British national opinion, as well as the attitude of the United Kingdom Government, is animated by some lower motive than fidelity to the League, but also that even this fidelity to the League cannot be relied upon. It is unjust and dangerously misleading to hold or encourage such illusions. The attitude of his Majesty's Government has been one of unwavering fidelity to the League and all that it stands for, and the case now before us is no exception, but, on the contrary, the continuance of that rule. The recent response of public opinion shows how completely the nation supports the Government in the full acceptance of the obligations of League membership, which is the oft proclaimed keynote of its foreign policy.

To suggest or insinuate that this policy is for some reason peculiar to the present question at issue would be a complete misunderstanding. It is to the principles of the League, and not to any particular manifestation, that the British nation has demonstrated its adherence. Any other view is at once an underestimate of our good faith and an imputation upon our sincerity. In conformity with its precise and explicit obligations the League stands, and my country stands with it, for the collective maintenance of the Covenant in its entirety, and particularly for steady and collective resistance to all acts of unprovoked aggression. The attitude of the British nation in the last few weeks has clearly demonstrated the fact that this is no variable and unreliable sentiment, but a principle of international conduct to which they and their Government hold with firm, enduring, and universal persistence.

There, then, is the British attitude towards the Covenant. I cannot believe that it will be changed so long as the League remains an effective body and the main bridge between the United Kingdom and the Continent remains intact.

Il Duce Tells Soldiers They Can't Wed Natives

Homesick Fascist soldiers, longing for romance, have sought to marry native women, some of whom are strikingly attractive. But while Premier Benito Mussolini is anxious to increase the Italian race, he is opposed to mixed marriages, and has ordered the army to ban them.

In Eritrea, Italian Somaliland and Ethiopia, wives may be bought for $10 to $100, or for one to twenty cows, depending on the girl's qualities and her parents' circumstances, according to a report in the New York Herald Tribune.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"—by Ripley

U.S.S.R. Has Over 100 Theaters For Children

discerning parent may still find entertainment for his children at the Old Vic or the Open Air Theater, each in its due season; but a generation of children cannot, or will not, live by Shakespeare alone and an escapade with Sir James Barrie in the Christmas holidays.

To ask for a hundred children's theaters throughout the country is, perhaps, to ask too much, but it is worth while to consider the Russian achievement and to aspire to one such theater permanently established as a basis of experiment. The rules are simple: do not play down; do not patronize; do not improve the occasion—if it is worth improving, it will improve itself; do not try to be funny outside the natural humor of the narrative chosen—children despise your embellishments; above all, regard as a sign of failure the loud collective laughter of adults. In default of private enterprise, the B.B.C., which is aware that there are children and that they have an imagination to use, might do much, not by wireless only, to give them access to a theater of their own. Meanwhile is it not possible that once at Christmas a little of the capital now poured into pantomime might be given to producing one of the fairy-stories in a dramatic version written by an artist close to the original The man who did it might well make a fortune. Funny men from the music-halls, contortionists, and the other campfollowers of Cinderella are an impediment to magic and to narrative. To transport a child to fairyland rather than drag it, by a string of sausages and unheroic couplets, through the long humors of a well-worn convention, might be, as Peter Pan has persistently suggested, not so unprofitable an enterprise as the conservation of the pantomimists would lead one to suppose.

Puerto Ricans Ask Roosevelt For Native Head

Young Professional Group Insists Island Has Won Right To Local Governor

Contending that thirty-seven years of association with the United States, with consequent assimilation of democratic ideals and practices, has won for Puerto Rico the right to have an islander at the head of its government, a group of young educators, scientists and professional men have appealed to President Roosevelt to replace Governor Blanton Winship with a native. The signers of the letter describe themselves as products of the American regime, born after the occupation and graduated from mainland universities, says the San Juan correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune.

Two signers, Jaime Benitez and Jorge Bermudez, are members of the social science department of the University of Puerto Rico. Dr. Jose Noya Benitez is attached to the School for Tropical Medicine, and most of the others are lawyers.

Assail Governor's Ability

The writers attack with blunt directness the ability of American governors. "We have suffered an uninterrupted succession of incompetent and unsympathetic governors from the mainland," they tell Mr. Roosevelt adding, "as yet they have a perfect record for utterly failing to understand our people and our problems."

The arraignment of Governor Winship is particularly severe. The President is informed that because of former Governor Robert H. Gore's "dismal failure," Governor Winship's arrival found the island psychologically ready for an era of governmental accomplishments, since the people were tired of complaining and anxious to begin reconstruction. According to the writers, however, the Governor has failed to win the faith of the people or to supply leadership.

To succeed Governor Winship the writers suggest three outstanding insular figures. Dr. Jose Padin, Commissioner of Education, is considered thoroughly prepared to direct the affairs of the island. Dr. Padin was reappointed by President Roosevelt to the education post after an investigation by Dr. Ernest Hopkins, president of Dartmouth College, had cleared him of a charge of "anti-Americanism" reported to have been made by former Governor Gore.

Judge Felix Cordova Davila, of the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico, formerly resident commissioner of Washington, and Judge Rafael Arjona Siaca, of the District Court of Humacao, are described as eminently qualified also.

Factions Not United

While no party leader would think of giving anything but the warmest commendation to this appeal of the younger generation for native leadership, it is highly improbable, should the governorship become vacant, that the political groups would unite in a determined effort to have a Puerto Rican named. The coalition which won the last election, composed of the Socialist and Union-Republican parties would find some difficulty in selecting a candidate commanding undivided support.

The majority party's main reason for remaining cold toward the proposal is a fear that should Washington decide to appoint a Puerto Rican a Liberal probably would be chosen.

Coalitionist leaders recognize that their Liberal opponents some time ago stole a march on them at Washington. Particularly since Dr. Ernest Gruening became actively interested in the island as the administrator of reconstruction, the majority party has felt itself at a disadvantage.

Tariffs Rising As A Chief Issue For Canadians

Election Will Indorse Or End Policy Of Levies To Safeguard Home Labor

Canada's ultimatum that, unless Japan withdraws the surtax applied to most of her imports from this country, the Bennett government will consider the Canadian-Japanese trade agreement abrogated, promises to become one of the major issues in the tariff-stressing election campaign, according to the Toronto correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune who wrote on September 14 as follows:

Richard B. Bennett, Prime Minister, says he wants to protect Canada against low-paid labor and depreciated currency, although the balance of trade between the two nations is greatly in Canada's favor. Removal of protective trade restrictions will wreck domestic business, he maintains, and will not increase foreign business.

"If Canadians were willing to sell their birthright of independence," he says, "such a surrender would not sell your goods in Japan or anywhere else, but would drive our workers into the ranks of the unemployed."

Free Trade Out, He says

Should Canadians pass their time talking free trade in a world where national tariffs are mounting ever higher, where economic nationalism commands and controls? Premier Bennett says, "No," that prosperity and protection are synonymous today.

Such tariff retaliations as the one against Japan had led to the closing of foreign markets, Mackenzie King, Liberal leader, retorts. "Japan was buying from us four times as much as we buy from her," he says, "yet we find the Bennett government prepared to fight rather than deal in good will."

These remarks have strengthened Japan's hand, declares Mr. Bennett, "Japan believing—and certainly hoping—that the Bennett government would be defeated," the Prime Minister says, "dared to flout it and attack your interests, knowing that with a change in government it could continue to do so. Because then Mr. King would be out smashing down our protective walls so that the commercial invaders of this country might sweeps in safely over their ruins."

Industry Divided

In adhering to this traditional high-tariff policy of the Conservative party, Mr. Bennett will receive support in Ontario and Quebec industrial centers whose existence would not be jeopardized by an influx of cheap Oriental manufactured products, but there will be strong opposition to abrogating the trade treaty from producers of wheat, fish, wood pulp and paper, planks and minerals, who have been carrying on a profitable business with the Nipponese.

Customs officials are empowered to apply artificial valuation on Japanese imports, as on goods imported from other countries with depreciated currencies, under the anti-dumping regulations. Imposition by Canada of an excise tax on cigarette lighters has prevented Japan from flooding this country with them, while they are being offered in the United States at 2½ cents each, duty paid. Other countries against which the Canadian currency-dumping duty applies are Germany, Czechoslovaka and Italy. The government argues there has been no discrimination.

King Calls It "Ruin"

Such tariff increases are assailed indignantly by Mr. King as an alienation of international good will and a ruination of business for a country which ranks among the world's leading exporters. He particularly attacks the Bennett marketing act as allowing manufacturers to set up monopolies and vesting bureaucratic powers in the Marketing Board, which not only may stop farmers from exporting their goods, or even growing them, but may fine and imprison them for failing to obey its orders.

Mr. King whose Liberal followers confidently expect to acclaim him as Prime Minister October 14, declares he does not intend to place any industry at the mercy of world competition under new conditions which have grown up in the last five years, but to proceed gradually in lowering tariffs.

Liberals Oppose Dumping

The Liberal policy is to abolish excessive increases in duties and the fixing of tariffs and values for duty by orders-in-council. There had been dumping duties before the Bennett government came on the scene, and a Liberal government would not expose Canadian producers to dumping from all quarters.

A Million-Dollar Temple Never Used

On April 6, 1841, the Mormon followers in Nauvoo, Illinois, started construction of a temple—"a house that should be built to His name, a house worthy of all acceptation". For five years building went on uninterrupted, and costly furnishings and equipment were installed. Upon completion on May 1, 1846, the temple was found to have cost $1,000,000, but mob rule, demanding evacuation of the Mormons from Nauvoo, compelled them to sell the structure only a few days after it was finished, and demolition was begun. What remained of the temple was burned down by an incendiary in 1848, and the last portion of charred walls disappeared in a tornado of 1850.

Italians Count On Secret War Chest

richer lands and are now dismayed to find their good dollars reduced overnight to doubtful lire.

These people are honestly bewildered as at last it seeps in that world opinion is united against the militant expansionism of Mussolini. They are stung to the core that an old friend, Britain, easy-going and brokerish when Japan, Paraguay and Germany flaunted the League of Na- [illegible] for violent punishment. They are people who calculate the costs, but the conviction that Britain does not want Italy as a colonial power in Africa persuades them that the last soldo is not too hight a price to pay to win. Momentarily they are sure they can overwhelm any enemy, even Britain.

Yesterday this correspondent walked along the waterfront as another shipload of cheering troops joined the long parade. It was like moving among Fascist slogans come to life. Beyond the electrified crowd dock laborers sat in a strange shadow cast by a modernistic fish market, munching a noonday meal of gray bread and cheese.

"Let English gunboats come," one shouted. "We will blow them out of the Mediterranean."

Is this super-confidence real? Is it a national hypnosis? Is it whistling to keep up courage? Frankly this correspondent cannot tell. How long it will last when the zero hour strikes, even Mussolini cannot know. Today it produces an impressive effect of national solidarity.

Reich's New Army Shows Its Power To Nazi Leaders

150 Tanks And All Other Arms Perform At Nuremberg For Hitler And Aides

For the first time since Germany broke with the Versailles Treaty, party and official Germany assembled on Sept. 16 at Nuremberg at an annual Nazi convention to witness an exhibition of Germany's new military prowess.

Every category of war weapon and every type of military formation the country possessed joined in the demonstration, according to the New York Times. Ultra-modern, tri-motored bombing planes roared overhead, while below 150 two-men tanks made civilian Germans gape.

Armored cars armed with machine guns made the air reverberate as they got into actoin in mimic warfare.

Foreign Attaches Present

Army, navy and air attaches of many nations used field glasses to take in the spectacle. They noted with special interest the emphasis on motorization.

The grandstand was crowded as it had not been during the convention week. Every reference to Germany's remilitarization has been greeted by roared "heils."

Demands to see the armed forces perform were so great that the same exhibition had to be given twice, in the morning and after lunch. The afternoon performance was of special note, however, because Chancellor Adolf Hitler addressed his soldiers and reviewed the troops. Later he inspected their camps.

Hitler appealed to them, as he so often has, for discipline, decency, hardness of physique and strength of character.

"Service under the colors has always been the highest honor in Germany," he told them. "This service requires great sacrifices both from you, my soldiers, and from the German people. But we all make these sacrifices cheerfully.

"Old Germany Risen"

"Our glorious army of imperial days was a wonderful school for our people. It made men of us. The old Germany is not dead. It merely rested, and now it has arisen again in you."

He asserted the World War army in reality had not been defeated but came out from that conflict with its honor unscathed.

"If other States have not yet decayed," he continued, "the fact that they rest on democracy does not prove our authority and principle are wrong, but rather that historical processes take time."

Wild applause greeted this assertion.

"Not economists, nor business leaders, nor professors, nor thinkers, nor artists saved Germany," he said, "but exclusively the political soldiery of our party."

Hitler announced the supremacy of the party over State officialdom, saying: "Our party must make corrections if the State apparatus does not function in accordance with party principles," and demanded unquestioning obedience from all Germans to the Nazi party's decisions.

The military exhibits laid emphasis upon German defense preparations. The bombing planes swooped over Nuremberg, demonstrating their fitness to repel air attacks.

Lieutenant Ernst Udet, World War ace, in an exhibition flight dropped 1,000 feet to fly over a house which then went up in flames, while a squad of bombers set fire to an artificial village.

Long's Book Jests At His Own Career

'My First Days In The White House' Was Revised Just Before Senator Died

Senator Long left behind him a satirical book, soon to be published, which contains not only his plans and aspirations, but gives an imaginary history of his first year as "President."

"My First Days in the White House" is the title of the volume, upon whose proof sheets he made changes as late as Aug. 31 when he went from Harrisburg to St. Louis. Written with a view of being a handbook in his Presidential campaign of 1936, it gives complete details of his "share-the-wealth plan" and he followed his description with the fancied success which met this scheme as it was carried out under his direction as the country's Chief Executive, says the New York Times.

The knowledge of public affairs gained in his lively campaigns in his home State, and during his more recent years at Washington, is reflected as chapter succeeds chapter and his narrative unfolds. Replete with native humor, the book nevertheless contains its fair share of political propaganda, but so arrayed as to make interesting reading, even for those not impressed with the Long political theories.

The volume will make its appearance within a short time under the imprint of the Harrisburg Press.

Roosevelt, Hoover in Cabinet

Illustrated throughout by caricatures, and giving evidence of the bizarre personality of Louisiana's dictator on almost every page, the book covers a period immediately following his presumed election in November, 1936, on through a part of 1937, when he completes his Cabinet, the selection of which shows an utter disregard of party labels. For instance, President Roosevelt is listed as Secretary of the Navy and former President Hoover as Secretary of Commerce.

The selection of the Long Cabinet indeed forms one of the most interesting sections of the manuscript, giving the Senator's version of how he negotiated with the members before inducing them to serve.

Besides the posts mentioned, portfolios are: Secretary of State, Senator Borah; Secretary of the Treasury, Senator Couzens; Secretary of War, General Smedley D. Butler of Pennsylvania; Secretary of the Interior, Major Gen. Lytle Brown of Tennessee; Attorney General, Frank Murphy of Michigan, Governor General of the Philippines, and for Secretary of Labor, Edward Keating of Colorado.

The Cabinet contains no Secretary of Agriculture or Postmaster General, the author having outlined plans to select the first from nominations by farmers' agencies and the second from postoffice employes on a merit basis.

Smith "Director of Budget."

Former Governor Alfred E. Smith of New York, is Director of the Budget, the appointment coming suddenly after a rapid-fire talk with Mr. Smith at the White House.

The narrative in Long's words follows a description of the new Cabinet's potentialities. He wrote:

"As Smith left, Senator Couzens was ushered into my study. He greeted me.

"'Well, Huey,' he said, 'I see you're raising as much hell as President as you did in the Senate.'

"He soon made me realize that he feared the possibility of disharmony in a Cabinet of so many strong-minded men.

"'For instance,' he asked, 'how can Smith and Roosevelt work together? How about Borah and Hoover.?'

"'What do I care whether they agree with one another?' I asked. 'Let Smith run the budget. Hoover will run the Commerce Department to a queen's taste. He will do a mighty fine job there, you'll see.

"'And why should Borah quarrel with Hoover over how Hoover runs the Commerce Department, any more than Hoover will quarrel with Borah about how Borah runs the State Department?'"

Aid in Share-Wealth Plan

The story goes at length into the share-the-wealth plan, upon which the Louisiana Senator hoped to hinge his 1936 campaign, but he emphasized also his ideas for the revision of the national defense, the national banking system, transportation, suppression of crime, education and the general rebuilding of the country's economic structure.

The book is filled with the names of prominent persons in business, civic and industrial life. John D. Rockefeller Jr., Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the Chase National Banks, and Andrew W. Mellong, former Secretary of the Treasury, are named in the story as among those who aided the "President" in the formulation of the share-the-wealth plan, which Long asserted in his manuscript was the backbone of his "administration."

Under his plan as he unfolds it, the Federal Government was to seize all wealth, but business, commerce and industry were to be operated privately.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Bit Of Ocean In Kansas

A spring that has been famous even back in the days of American Indian lore, is the Waconda Spring of Mitchell County, Kansas. The spring is on top of a mound about 300 feet across, the pool being 54 feet in diameter. Geologists have never been able to determine exactly how deep the pool may be, but have taken soundings down to 700 feet. The spring water is saline, very similar to ocean water, but the astounding feature is that it has a "tide", the water level varying as much as 15 inches each day.

M chine-Gun Army US Five-Year Plan

MacArthur Envisages Model Force With Great Speed And Efficiency

A plan to transform the United States regular army within five years into a model fighting force for speed and efficiency and comparable striking power is outlined by General Douglas Mac-Arthur, retiring chief of staff, in his farewell report made public in Washington, D.C. on Sept. 22.

He envisions every rifleman as virtually a machine gunner, trained to act on his own in an emergency, transported by small vehicles moving at sixty or more miles an hour directly to the field of action, says the New York Times.

This infantryman, whose equipment would resemble that of the Prussian guardsman, when, in the closing year of the World War, the German shock troops moved to the attack with a machine gun to every two men, would have the support of artillery moving at seventy miles an hour and would in turn support a striking force of 2,500 combat planes by his speed.

This "super soldier" of the regular army, moving at express train speed, should be supported in time of need, in General MacArthur's view, by a reserve army having in peace time an enlistment of at least 120,000 well trained men, and a National Guard approaching a half million.

All of these developments can be assured, General MacArthur says, if the War Department program is "accorded the additional but relatively inexpensive legislative support herein recommended."

Urges West Point Class of 400

Speed and mobility in each arm of the service is emphasized over and over.

"Through proper organization in all echelons, through the development and perfection of reliable combat machines capable of speedy maneuver, and through the improvement of transportation, maintenance, communication, and supply arrangements, the objective of greater and still greater speed must be pursued," General MacArthur wrote.

To supervise this "mechanized" high speed army, both in the air and on land, General MacArthur calls for a greater percentage of professionally trained officers. He commends Congress for increasing the number of cadets at West Point from 1,374 to 1,960.

After extolling the qualifications given by military academy training, the general, who was for several years superintendent of the academy, declared that a graduating class of 400 annually would be necessary to sustain the "proper proportion" of West Point graduates, which he would place at 50 per cent of the whole officer personnel in the army.

The five-year program as outlined by General MacArthur applies particularly to equipment both as to actual weapons and the transport equipment, the means for making these effective.

He points that much of the army motor equipment today goes back to 1918, that its rifles for the most part are of a model of thirty years ago and that our guns, save for a few models, are still being moved in great emergency at a speed of only seven to eight miles an hour.

5-Year Objective on Equipment

General MacArthur set the following objectives, in the Five-Year Plan, for procurement of equipment, other than for the Air Corps:

Mechanization—One cavalry brigade; two regiments of tanks (infantry); seven separate armored car troops for use with three regular and four National Guard divisions of cavalry; thirteen mechanized platoons (scout cars) for regular regiments of cavalry; seven companies of tanks for use with regular infantry divisions.

Motorization—The motorization program of the War Department with respect to both the regular army and the National Guard has been worked out in detail. It involves every arm and service, each according to its specific needs, and may be summarized by saying that in every instance where motors have demonstrated an ability to meet normal transportation requirements their substitution for animals is advocated. About 18,000 vehicles of various types are still required.

Rifles—One of the new semiautomatic weapons for every rifleman in the regular army. This to be immediately followed by a similar five-year program for the National Guard.

Artillery—Modification of all field guns pertaining to active units of the regular army and National Guard, both for highspeed towage and for increasing flexibility of fire. Experimentation and development programs to continue in the effort to simplify this type of material.

Anti-aircraft Artillery—Complete equipment for all active regiments of regular army and National Guard. To be followed by a similar program to equip all inactive regiments of regular army.

Chemical Warfare Service—Sustaining program for continuation of experimentation. Procurement in five years of necessary defensive and protective equipment for regular army and National Guard at war strength.

Ammunition Reserve—Gradual accumulation in essential calibres to meet the needs of the regular army and National Guard at full peace strength for thirty days in active operation.

Miscellaneous Equipment—Infantry mortars, various classifications of machine guns, searchlights, signal equipment, and other essential items in needed amounts for regular army and National Guard at full peace strength.

He declared that the above aims should be "unfailingly" attained within the period.

Sees Combat Strength Doubled

The retiring chief of staff remarks in beginning his report that, for the first time since 1922, the army was to enter the new fiscal year with a "reasonable prospect" of developing a defense establishment something like what the country needed.

He touches briefly on recent improvement in the lot of the army, which from a peace-time authorization of 280,000 had dropped to 118,750 with a proportionate loss in efficiency. Under the Appropriations Bill for 1936 these conditions are to be changed. The enlisted strength is to be brought to 165,000, which General MacArthur asserts will double the army's combat effectiveness.

In dealing with the enlisted man and the non-commissioned officer, he recommends a new study of the non-commissioned grades, with the thought of providing pay for the men in keeping with their duties.

General MacArthur discussed at some length the new General Headquarters Air Force, which, as far as organization was concerned, was capable of performing every mission that could be carried out by an air force separated from the army and with much greater economy, he said.

He envisioned the air force as a striking body in itself, not merely an adjunct of the ground troops, the role it has been required to play in the past. He pointed out that the power of the air force to deliver sudden and devastating blows upon a target can be put to advantageous use "if the commanders have available special units which can speedily support air operations and sustain the opportunities created by it until additional forces can come into action."

General MacArthur's term is up on Dec. 15; he will then take up the work of organizing the defense forces of the new Commonwealth of the Philippines.

Birth Control Is Held Impractical In USSR

ment for the first time, the results would have been different.

Not Impressive

The Soviet Union's population, according to official figures, rose from 142,000,000 in 1918 to 168,000,000 in 1934, an increase of 18.3 per cent in 16 years. The population of the Philippine Islands under American rule rose from 7,600,000 in 1903 to 10,300,000 in 1918, an increase of 36.9 per cent in 15 years. In the first seven years after Japan took over the government of Korea in 1910, Korea's population increased by more than 30 per cent.

In these reasonable comparisons, Soviet Russia's record is not impressive. Civil wars and famines checked the growth which might have been expected. The Soviet Governments use of force in socializing agriculture and its determination to make Russia independent in heavy industries and the manufacture of munitions was expensive to the population.

But apparently the period of civil war and famines is now ended. Moscow is introducing universal compulsory education, is extending as rapidly as possible state care of mother and children, is endeavoring to improve the diet and housing of both agricultural and urban population. With the restriction of extreme measures of birth control, the rate of population growth is likely to increase.

Restriction Desirable

If it were expedient, the Communists probably would like to restrict growth of population. They are very eager to raise living standards, as only in this fashion can they demonstrate the superiority of their system over capitalism. Obviously, it is more difficult to raise living standards for a larger population.

But the Communists have studied history, and know that primitive populations, submitted for the first time to the advantages of modern government, will always increase at a tremendous rate. Their experiments in extreme birth control admittedly have failed. The Communists prefer to make a virtue of necessity, to face boldly the prospect of an increase in population of at least 3,000,000 persons a year, and to prepare for such an increase by extending as rapidly as possible the area of cultivable land and the output of "consumers goods."

The arguments concerning the respective merits of Russia's system of state socialism or state capitalism, as compared with other political and social systems, are perennial and often futile. But altogether apart from the system of government,

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Holy Water Of Matrimony

Situated in the outskirts of the city of Keijo, Chosen, (Korea) where I made my sketch a few years ago, is a unique spring whose waters are believed to endow a deserted husband with exact knowledge of his wife's whereabouts. Whenever a woman deserts her husband, the aggrieved man repairs to the "Matrimonial Spring" for enlightenment. And whether or not he succeeds in locating his lost wife, the courts will not entertain any action by the husband until he proves that he has first visited the Spring.

Will Rogers' Will Is Admitted To Probate

Will Rogers's will, bequeathing all of his property to his wife, was admitted to probate in Superior Court at Los Angeles, Cal., on Sept. 16. No official estimate had been made of the value of his estate up to that time.

The court required bond of $50,000 each from the executors, James K. Blake, the humorist's brother-in-law: Oscar Lawler, Mr. Rogers's attorney, and O. N. Beasley, according to the New York Times. Mrs. Rogers, also named as an executor, was specifically exempted from bond in the will.

Mr. Blake, called as attesting witness, said that the personal property was valued at about $40,000. Of this amount, he said, $30,000 was placed as the value of the furnishings in Rogers's Santa Monica mountain home. Other property, he said, consisted of fourteen horses, valued at $1,920, two miles at $75, ranch equipment at $700, office furniture at $200, two automobiles, a truck and a trailer at $860, cash in Rogers's possession at the time of his death, $700, and travelers' checks, $2,040.

Max Felix, counsel for the estate, told the court that most of Mr. Rogers's real property was held in joint tenancy with his wife and that proceedings to terminate the joint tenancy would be instituted in the near future, when a more accurate estimate of the fortune could be made.

Former President Of Chicago Women's Club Reviews Her Experiences

Mrs. Ozora A. Davis, wife of the former president of the Chicago Theological Seminary and herself former president of the Chicago Women's Club, was the guest speaker at the Kyoto prayer meeting held last Wednesday evening in the home of Miss M. F. Denton. With her son Wilfred, she is making a trip around the world studying international thought, currents and conditions. Apologizing for her inquisitiveness, she stated that it was hardly fair to require that a student stop his study for a while that he might impart some of the things he had learned to those from whom he had been studying. She accordingly spoke on certain windows of opportunity that had been opened to her during her quarter of a century in Chicago.

The first was opened by Mrs. Moses Smith, a member of the Women's Board of Missions of the Interior who called upon her immediately after she had moved to Chicago, and solicited her help. The local chapter of this movement held Friday meetings at which time their place in the various mission movements throughout the world was kept before their attention. Their pride and joy at that time was Kobe College. Each year they had a budget for $164,000, which was not always forthcoming with the greatest of ease. During the final few weeks of the year therefore, there was a hurried effort on the part of the members to raise the balance by writing letters to friends. And usually, the amount asked and the amount received were approximately the same. The work of this society was subsequently merged into the American Board of Foreign Missions, but the Friday meetings in Chicago of this original society continue to this day.

A second window vista was made available through the invitation of Mrs. Lester Curtis, a quiet woman, who had a tremendous power because of her devotional life. Mrs. Curtis was then head of the Chicago Woman's Club, organized in 1870 with the motto "Nothing pertaining to Humanity is foreign to us". This organization initiated the Juvenile court system of Chicago, the Stevens Memorial Home for destitute women and children, and surveyed the city to locate the forces making for juvenile criminality. This movement of women's clubs started in Detroit and spread from city to city. Even despite the present depression it is continuing to grow. A present contribution to the life of American women is that clubs have made a noble experiment in the use of leisure, by providing study groups and a technique for corporate thinking. Jane Adams pronounced this as the greatest contribution the Women's Club movement has ever made.

Still a third opening was through an invitation to become a member of the Advisory Committee of the Laymen's Board of Foreign Mission Inquiry. A year passed after she had accepted the invitation and nothing happened. Then one day she was asked to come to Lake Mohawk to hear read the first literary product of the Commission, prepared by the Commissioners who had actually made the survey and study. Out of this work has grown the Modern Missions Movement which is designed to carry on a perpetual research in the field of mission work. What will come of this movement it is too early to decide. Only two meetings have been held as yet. Nothing decisive has been determined upon. That the movement will serve as the necessary corrective to unprofitable phases of present missionary work is to be expected as the prime contribution of the new movement. But it is not to be solified into an organization. It was begun and will continue its existence as a plastic movement, changing according to the needs of the times.

10,000 In NY City Hail Constitution

Blending Of Nationalities Is Symbolized By Pageant In Many Native Costumes

Men and women in native costumes from all parts of the world moved past a background of massed flags in New York City Hall Plaza on Sept. 17 in a pageant symbolizing the nationalities absorbed in the American population since the adoption of the Constitution 148 years ago.

From a platform bordered with palms, citizens representing many nationalities repeated the oath of allegiance to the Constitution and to the flag in their native tongues, according to the New York Times. Other speakers condemned communistic and other anti-American activities and called for support of the Constitution and the preservation of American ideals.

More Than 10,000 Attend

About 10,000 persons assembled in the plaza and many others in nearby streets heard the addresses through loud speakers. The seated audience included 148 special guests representing the 148 birthdays of the Constitution.

Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, one of the principal speakers, referred to the Constitution as "the noblest work of government that has come from the human race," and warned against "changes that political tinkers may attempt."

Deutsch Represents the Mayor

In the absence of Mayor La Guardia, who had gone to Hyde Park for a conference with President Roosevelt, Aldermanic President Bernard S. Deutsch welcomed delegations of war veterans and patriotic societies. He urged them not to be led into believing that the Constitution "is a static document and cannot be changed."

"Our forefather made provisions for change," he said, "if it appeared necessary in a changing order, a changing world and with a changing economic policy."

The exercises were held under the auspices of the Greater New York Veterans Constitution Day Committee.

Other speakers included Assemblyman Laurens Hamilton, great-great-grandson of Alexander Hamilton, and the representatives of veterans' organizations of the Civil, Spanish-American and World Wars.

Rear Admiral Reginald B. Belknap, retired, commander of the New York Chapter, Military Order of the World War, presided. Chief Justice Frederic Kernochan of the Court of Special Sessions was chairman of the reception committee.

The Steuben Society of America celebrated Constitution Day and Baron Frederick William von Steuben's 205th birthday anniversary at the Hotel Astor last night. About 1,000 persons attended the dinner and dance. Support of the Constitution was pledged by various speakers, who eulogized General von Steuben's achievements in reorganizing the Continental Army.

The speakers included Gustav W. M. Wieboldt, New York State chairman of the Steuben Society; Colonel John W. Downer, representing Major Gen. Dennis E. Nolan; Representative R. S. Amlie of Wisconsin, Ernst E. Hausamann, chairman of the New Jersey State council, and Theodore H. Hoffmann, chairman of the national council of the Steuben Society. Eugene Caplan was toastmaster.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Sunshine On Two Days Simultaneously

The Bering Strait, which connects the Arctic and Pacific Oceans, narrows down to a mere 56 miles across where one can see from Cape Prince of Wales on the American shore to East Cape (Deshnev) in Asia. Almost exactly in the middle of the strait are two small islands, Nunarbook and Ignalook, known as the Diomede Islands, which are but one mile apart, yet Nunarbook is in Russian Siberia and Ignalook belongs to the United States. The International Date Line, as well as the International Boundary, runs between the islands. When it is Sunday in Ignalook, it is Mondaly in Numarbook, yet the sun rises, shines all day, and sets on both spots at exactly the same time.

Portugal Puts 'Not For Sale' On Its Colonies

of the African chart, Dr. Monteiro said that too much is imprudently being guessed at and said about it. Many people seem to think it would prove to be the key to European equlibrium and a means of satisfying certain colonial ambitions of late comers in the African scramble. This is not the case. At the present time, nationalism is too deep-rooted to permit European statesmen to cut up the map of the Dark Continent according to their convenience.

Will Defend Boundaries

If a Congress for the revision of Colonial Frontiers were convoked, Portugal, like all other countries, will defend its boundaries to the utmost.

Questioned about the report that the Portuguese colonies were discussed when the recent Anglo-German Naval Agreement was made, which caused a stir in public opinion here, he stated that the Portuguese diplomatic representatives at London and Berlin obtained a definite denial that any reference had been made to the colonies. He concluded by saying that there is no cause for alarm, as "England has treaties which bind her to defend our Colonial Empire, and England always fulfills her promises."

Position of Women Is Pictured In Paper Read Refore Seminar

In the race for survival, the women of Japan are making their way into men's sphere of work but their social status still presents a sorry spectacle, wrote Mrs. Waka Yamada, well known social leader, in a lecture which was read before Seminar 11 of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai Tuesday afternoon at the Meiji building.

The address was the first in the group of three seminars which the society is to sponsor this year. About 100 persons attended the meeting.

In explaining national characteristics as a background for her talk on the social status of women, Mrs. Yamada reminded the audience that Amaterasu Omikami, enshrined at Ise, the mother, creator, and protector of the Japanese people is a Goddess—is a woman. She also stressed the fact the Japanese nation is founded and based upon the family system. Japan, she said, to the Japanese, represents one big family, unified, represented and headed by the Emperor.

"Just as the Emperor is the head of the nation so the husband is the master of the family. The master of the family follows truth in dispensing with his duties in heading the family. This, perhaps, is the fundamental idea underlying the family system," she said.

"Family life consists of two pillars, the husband and wife," she continued. "Together they procreate, they work to protect and to guard their children. But this family needs someone to lead and to represent this unit and man was thus chosen as the head. This head of the family has absolute powers in the matter of property rights and the education and rearing of his children. And in the exercise of his powers he is commanded by an Imperial rescript to protect his family, and to promote its welfare and happiness.

"Originally, the family was intended to be knit together by love where the master lovingly and solicitously cared for and protected his wife and children and his family looked up to him and depended upon him with love and deep respect. And thus in olden times a woman was a very faithful, obedient, happy wife. A husband gloried in meritorious service for his nation, always ready to give up his life for his Emperor. A husband lived for his country. A wife, in turn, lived for her husband. In this way the country was protected and strengthened as one national family through the united firmness and solidity of each individual family unit. This was and is the real Japanese spirit.

"However, this power and authority given to man began in time to be misinterpreted and misused and from early times woman has come to be regarded as a being incapable of earning an independent livelihood,—as a parasite animal.

"Those with a cold and scientific eye look at present day Japan and say that ideal family life is dying out but I do not think so. The present day unhappy and unsatisfactory conditions must be remade. I only think that we are on the road towards the recreation of a more perfect family life.

"It must be admitted that the social status of Japanese women tuday presents a sorry spectacle. However, there are many ideal families in Japan where the husband in love and understanding looks after the welfare of his wife and family. In such families it does not matter if the wife has no property rights, if she has no legal authority over her children, or if a double standard of morals exist. In such a family the husband's power and authority are used after discussion and agreement between husband and wife. Such a man uses his right of property control for the welfare of his wife and children and they need never suffer therefrom. In such a family even though the father has complete authority over his children according to law he will not forget to take into account the mother love and care of his wife in carrying out his duties. Such a husband respects the sacredness of motherhood, fatherhood and the family and will not become untrue to his wife and family. It must be pointed out that a certain percentage of the people belong to this ideal group. They form the salt of the earth and are the firm pillars on which the future of the nation rests. But what I am about to discuss does not belong to this ideal class but to an entirely different class where man's leadership and authority has been misused and misinterpreted.

"Thus, it gradually came to pass that ideas, customs and laws even dealt with man as the head and center of the family. In a country where a man was considered the head, the center around which the wheel of family life turns, a woman was regarded as a being born into the world just for the sake of man and was treated as such. Misconceived and misapplied conceptions have gradually and increasingly come to oppress and prevent woman from fully and freely living her life as a mother and a woman as God intended.

"For instance, in olden days when men became unfaithful the women said, "A woman's jealousy is a shameful thing," and they may have suffered intensely inwardly but outwardly they remained calm and smiling.

"However, under the same circumstances today an intelligent, thoughtful woman and a good mother believes that an immoral, unfaithful husband cannot be the head and protector of a good, clean family, nor the father of worthy future generations. But when they protest, the husbands say, "I am lord and master and can do whatever I please," and past traditions, customs and even laws will support him. Then a woman may turn to her parents for sympathy and assistance but they would say to her, "Just as long as he can take care of you and protect you he is fulfilling his duties as head of the family. He is entitled as a man to indulge at times." In desperation the woman looks to the law for protection. However, according to our laws a woman who commits adultery is punishable but a man is free to do so.

"Here may I mention another matter. The desires of women who wished to carry on the ideals of beautiful family life and of womanhood and motherhood were oppressed and suppressed by such traditions and customs. Thus at a time when women were driven almost to the point of suffocation a newspaper suggested that all women with problems and worries of their own write in for advice through its columns, vast multitudes rushed to take advantage of the offer.

"The Asahi newspaper with which I am connected made this offer 4½ years ago in May 1931. Between May 1st and Dec. 25th of that year 17,052 letters poured in. The black clouds of women's suffering and oppression overflowed the newspaper offices and overwhelmed me."

Mrs. Yamada also spoke of the discrimination against women in business and in professions, declaring that school teachers, for instance, receive a 30 per cent lower salary than the men. She reported that cabinet after cabinet has ignored the woman's problem. Speaking of the purity movement, she said it was rumored that the Home Minister intended to abolish the licensed district but that when the Imperial Diet convened, there was such strong lobbying on the part of owners of the licensed quarters as well as an inclination to let matters stand on the part of so many Diet members that the good intentions of the Home Ministry faded into the air.

Mrs. Yamada recalled that women's movements began at the end of the Meiji Period about 25 years ago. In past history great women have appeared at times, famous literary women, Empresses of great power and women military leaders who performed great deeds of valor. However, they left no deep impression or effect upon the thinking of average women. In the Meiji Period women appeared once more in the literary world and even in the political world but they had no influence on the masses of Japanese women in general. However, women's awakening at the end of the Meiji Period was not a thing to be so easily ignored by the people.

The paper reviewed the accomplishments of the women's movement and concluded that perhaps at the moment the gods are standing at the entrance of the cave in which woman has been hiding, planning how to draw her forth.

Sadanji As Eccentric Artist

Serenity in Contrast

A decided contrast is the serenity of "Sumidagawa," the Kabuki dance-drama, adapted from the No stage. The eyes are pleased by an expanse of blue water with regular white ripple marks, and a hill rising out of the mist. Even the Kiyomoto singers and musicians kneel on a blue platform, behind them high screens of azure and silver.

Umeosuke, however, as the mad woman in search of her lost son who comes to the banks of the Sumida River at twilight to find his tomb, is not at any moment of the performance under the skin of the role. The rough, manly tones of this robust actor are disguised to a female treble, but he does not bring conviction.

Kabuki Stage Conventions

The staging of this old favorite by Seifu Matsuda is thoroughly in keeping with Kabuki convention: The bank of the river is pulled off and the chorus describes the trip across the river, although the boat does not move, and the distant shore is reached when a willow tree and the boy's tomb, a grassy mound, is pushed on.

"Omura Masujiro," a biographical play by Kinjiro Ono, the theater critic of the Yomiuri, gives Sadanji the opportunity to appear as a Dutch scholar and physician who was active at the time of the Restoration.

A new aspect of Shin Hasegawa as a playwright is also shown in "Kago and Rikisha," the slight plot dealing with a race between the two old fashioned means of conveyance. After a strenuous competition a bicycle appears, the ancestor of the thousands in present day Tokyo, the kago bearers and the rikisha pullers staring in amazement at the new invention.

Golf Puzzler

W. F. Weber, at the Sunningdale Club, Toledo, Ohio, scored a 5 on a 425-yard hole, although he never in the rough, and escaped all sand traps. In teeing off on No. 10 tee, he hooked the ball over onto No. 12 putting green, about 150 yards distant. Next he sliced over to No. 1 green, missing fairway and rough entirely. From there he landed square on No. 10 green, his original objective, and took two putts for a five.

Interviewed by newspapermen aboard the liner, General MacArthur recalled his first visit to Japan in 1905 when he met the late General Maresuke Nogi and added that it had been his wish to see the late Fleet-Admiral Marquis Heihachiro Togo, Japan's naval hero in his life time. She told newspapermen that she is going to Vienna to join her husband.

Miss Sai Shoki, Korean Dancer, Will Present Programs Tuesday

Miss Sai Shoki, the noted Korean dancer, will give her long expected and awaited dance program at the Hibiya Public Hall at 2 p.m. and 7 p.m. Tuesday.

Ever since she appeared in a program given under the auspices of the Japan Humane Society last winter at the little theater of the Takarazuka, the foreign community of Tokyo has been unusually interested in her career and has been watching for her next appearances. But Miss Sai is an artist who will not appear until she herself is thoroughly satisfied that her dance are as perfect as possible.

Miss Sai is a young girl, little over 20. She came to Tokyo from her native Korea about two years ago, unknown and without friends. Her assets were not of a financial nature. She had only a knowledge of the country dances of Korea and the determination to be a great dancer. She won an audience with Baku Ishii, the noted exponent of modern dancing, and he was so impressed with her ability that he asked her to join his studio.

She studied there for about a year and then opened her own studio, for she was eager to work out her own dances, some of which are purely Korean, others of which are the products of her own imagination.

Off-stage, Miss Sai looks more like a healthy, husky girl athlete Her build is larger than that of the usual dancer but she is smart enough to capitalize on what might have been a handicap. On the stage, her size is impressive in itself and when she dances the warrior dance in dazzling costume, the moment is one of dramatic height. In another dance, with a soft, black fringed costume, she is effectively emotional. It seems that the petite dancer would be lost trying to do what Miss Sai does so easily and so well.

In the last few months, Miss Sai has been back in Korea making a motion picture of her own life. That in itself attests to her rapid success. But she is not satisfied with her accomplishments to date. In the vernacular papers today, there is the news that she will leave early in the spring for a trip around the world. New York city has always been her aim, as it has for so many climbing artists. Last winter she had an opportunity to appear on the New York stage but she turned it down. "I don't think I am ready," she told those who wanted to back her. "I must study another year at least and then I'll love to go."

Miss Sai Shoki.

Her program Tuesday afternoon and evening, which will undoubtedly include the numbers she will give on her round-the-world recital, is in three parts. She opens with "The Dance of A King." This is an old Korean dance. Miss Sai has created her own costumes as well as many of her dances and those who remembering her glittering creations last winter, will be eager to see what she has done in this line during her long silence.

Other numbers in the first group of dances Tuesday will be "The Immolation," "Three Poems," "The Rapsody," and a Korean style duet.

The second group will include a classic Korean dance, "The Dance of the Priestess," and "The Dance of the Mask" as well as three others. One dance will be without accompaniment.

The final group will include "The Magician Dance" which Miss Sai will do to Japanese music, the "Dance of the Golden Finger," and "Red and Black." Her last number will be "The Stream of Mind."

British Telephone Project To Connect All Rural Regions

Outlying rural areas in Britain are to be connected to the telephone system, and 11,000 subscribers are to benefit from lower phone charges under new schemes being put into operation by the Post Office, in London.

The present system whereby a village must have a post office to have a public telephone is to be abolished. Instead, any hamlet or isolated parish will be able to be connected to the telephone system of Britain, provided the local parish council will pay a charge similar to five years' rental of a private line.

The Post Office makes a charge for installing these rural phones in case the annual number of calls is not sufficient to pay for the installation and maintenance of the call box and the wires, according to the Christian Science Monitor. In October the first new telephone rental charges will come into operation, giving relief to the subscribers. The area round the telephone exchange within which the standard rental charges apply is to be widened from two miles to three.

This will bring almost all the telephones in Britain within the standard rate area. There are 11,000 subscribers at present paying extra charges. The Post Office calculates that 10,000 of these will be relieved of all extras, and that the remaining 1000 will have their annual rentals reduced by from four to eight pounds.

Lahore Moslems Seek Rebuilding Of Mosque

have so far failed to find any legal means by which the Court decisions can be reversed. In their present temper the Sikhs are not prepared to come to any agreement by consent with the Moslems. The Sikhs attach great importance to their historic rights and also hold the view that if they yield to Moslem pressure on this issue they will find their political position more difficult under the new Constitution.

Sikhs and Legal Rights

The Sikhs are determined to stick to their legal rights. Although some disapprove the folly of pulling down the building, the community as a whole are solid in refusing to make any concessions under threat of intimidation. The Moslems have adopted the attitude of "once a mosque always a mosque," and the extremists among them appeal to Koranic law. This attitude brings them into conflict with the law of tht country.

The demolition of the building caused great resentment among Moslems, which is being exploited by political agitators. While many reasonable Moslems recognize that the original agitation was misconceived and misguided, its inevitable failure has added to a sense of grievance felt by the community. There is a feeling that the Government should have helped the Moslems rather than uphold the legal rights of the Sikhs, who from the beginning of the movement have shown a strong anti-Government trend.

This attitude has increased the danger of widespread trouble, and repercussions of the events at Lahore were felt at many places in the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province. Firm action by the Punjab Government prevented these reactions from assuming serious form in the Punjab, where the authorities had to deal not only with communal but with anti-Government forces.

Effect in Tribal Territory

The discontent then engendered is still latent, and the danger of it taking an active form is illustrate by the events in tribal territory beyond the borders of the Hazara district. The tribes there were stirred up by exaggerated fanatical account of the events at Lahore, and lashkar (tribal forces) gathered with the declared intention of taking revenge on non-Moslems and recovering the site of the mosque. These activities resulted in military activities, which are still in progress.

Moslem proposal to launch a civil disobedience campaign has dangerous possibilities.

Topsails Are Not Top Sails

Such rigging terms as flying jib, mizzen royal, crossjack, spanker and topsail, mean little to the uninitiated and the land-lubber, except that it does seem the topsail should be on top. However, on a full-rigged ship the sails second from the deck are the topsails, with four other sails above them. On the main mast, for instance, the real top sail is the main skysail, next the main royal, then the topgallant, upper topsail, lower topsail and mainsail.

West Point Girl

Under prevailing regulations, a son of a commissioned officer killed in war, is entitled to an appointment to either of the nation's training schools—West Point or Annapolis—exclusively masculine. Yet Miss Sidney Edwards of Newport News, Va., received appointments to both schools. Authorities just supposed that "Sidney" was a boy and granted the appointments without question. Miss Edwards' father, Lieut. John D. Edwards, was killed during the World War when his destroyer collided with the Acquitania in the English Channel.

Society of English Literature Shows Translation of Classics

The English Literature Society of Japan held its annual meeting at the Imperial university over the weekend with several hundred teachers and students in attendance. A special feature of the meeting was the exhibition of English translations of Japanese books which demonstrated the relatively large number of Japanese works which have found translators. The exhibition included, beside such well known works as Arthur Waley's translation of "The Tale of Genji" a number of the Japanese classics which have been rendered into English.

The meeting opened at one o'clock Saturday with Professor Minoru Toyoda presiding, and after an opening address by the president of the society, Prof. Sanki Ichikawa of the Tokyo Imperial University the regular program of lectures began. At the Saturday session Professor Kuwaki of the Tokyo Imperial University delivered a special lecture on English Literature and Philosophy, and during the course of the program Professors Sanki Ichikawa and T. Funahashi served successively as chairman.

The Sunday session was opened at nine o'clock with Professor K. Ishida in the chair. At noon a get-together meeting and lunch, held in one of the university dining halls, were under the direction of Professor Y. Ishikawa. At the conclusion of the lectures Professor Takeshi Saito delivered the closing address.

The schedule of lectures indicated a wide range of interests among Japanese scholars of English literature, including papers on Chaucer and Piers Plowman, Celtic literature, three papers on Shakespeare, and special studies of Milton, Keats, Wordsworth. Jane Austen, and Emerson. Several papers showed an interest in modern literature, one of them being concerned with the American dramatist Paul Green who is remembered for his success. "In Abraham's Bosom."

Beside the annual meeting, the society also publishes a quarterly journal, "Studies in English Literature," the October number of which is always devoted entirely to articles written in English. Western Canada Fights Twin Dangers To Soil ment. A committee has been formed with its headquarters in Saskatchewan, and has many plans in hand. Nearly 5,000 applications for assistance for the construction of wells, dug-outs, dams, and other means of conserving water supplies have been received from farmers, and a staff of engineers are taking their problems in hand.

A corp of scientists are also looking into the question of the moisture content of soils taken from different parts of the affected areas. Others are examining the influence of trees on wind velocity and the like under the direction of Mr. Norman Ross, one of the world's greatest authorities on forestry. He is distributing millions of trees to farmers from his laboratories.

Yet another small army of experts are going into problems of grass development with particular reference to their suitability to resist soil-drifting.

It has already been much evident to the committee that if such work as is now being done had been undertaken twenty years ago, even with the scientific facilities then available, much of the trouble to which Western farmers are liable today would never have arisen.

£200,000 A Year

The Rehabilitation Committee—whose work is being co-ordinated by the Dominion's agricultural expert, Dr. Archibald, from Ottawa, has £150,000 to spend during the coming year, and £200,000 a year for the next four years. In addition, £100,000 has been allotted this year for water development.

Its members consist of two representatives of the Dominion Department of Agriculture, one representative of the grain-growing farmers from the drought and soil-drifting areas in each of the three Prarie Provinces, one representative from the Saskatchewan livestock farmers, one representative of the Calgary Range farmers from the drought areas, and one representative from the mortgage companies of Canada, the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, and one from each of the Governments of the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta.

The members receive no pay. Their work is characteristic of the energy and zeal with which Canada is promoting the progress of every section of her agricultural industry.

ON ADVENTURE TOUR

After an extensive tour of 10,000 miles on foot and 7,000 miles by bicycle, Mr. K. C. Banenee, a young Indian, has arrived in Yokohama on his way around the world. His trip so far has covered two years.

Mr. Banenjee related that having graduated from Calcutta University in India, he left Bengal in 1933 on foot on a walking tour round the world to study economic, social and political conditions of the different countries. After walking a few thousand miles, he reached Kabul, the capital city of Afganistan, but owing to some fighting in the Afgan and Persian frontier, he could not proceed any further. He therefore tramped back to India and walked eastwards until he reached Rangoon where he bought a bicycle which brought him to Yokohama after passing through Borneo, China, Shimonoseki, Kobe, Osaka, Kyoto and Nagoya. During his journey he was robbed of his possessions several times. Many prominent men, such as Mr. Gandhi and Dr. Tagore, wished him success in his adventurous enterprise, he added.

Mr. Banenjee is staying in the Y.M.C.A. apartment in Yokohama and he expects to leave here after five or six days for Tokyo to continue his schedule.

Viceroy Of India Addresses Govt. Houses At Simla

Tells Members To Forget Differences And Consider Gain Conferred By India Act

The Viceroy of India, Lord Willingdon, drove in state on Sept. 11 in Simla from the Viceregal Lodge to the Assembly Chamber to address a joint session of both Houses of the Legislature. Galleries were resplendent with the dresses of the Indian women, while the levee dress of officials and the splendid uniforms and costumes of military officers and Indian gentlemen made a magnificent spectacle. The Congress Party absented themselves from the proceedings, but all other parties, including the Congress Nationalists, were present.

The Viceroy began with a tribute, loudly cheered, to the outstanding services of Field-Marshal Sir Philip Chetwode, whose term of office as Commander-in-Chief has been one of the most eventful within living memory, says The Times, London. There were more cheers when Lord Willingdon referred to India's spontaneous enthusiasm over the Silver Jubilee, and to the splendid sum of £1,000,000 collected for the Jubilee Fund.

The Viceroy said he felt justified in again sounding a note of optimism with regard to the foreign trade of India. Exports of merchandise, he said, showed during the first four months of the present year an increase of 4¼ crores of rupees (£3,937,500) over the corresponding period in 1933. Despite the exceptional purchase of cotton last year by Japan, there had been a small increase over last year's total.

The balance of trade with Germany swung in India's favor, and exports towards Italy showed an unexpectedly small decline in view of the restrictions imposed.

A Single India

Turning to constitutional questions in a passage punctuated with frequent cheers, the Viceroy urged that it was now the business of practical men to forget individual differences and consider the gain conferred by the Government of India Act. It was a matter of great satisfaction to him that during his period as Viceroy there had been made possible a consummation desired throughout the ages by many great rulers in India—the consolidation for the first time of the whole of India for common purposes under a single Government. India for the first time could become one great country. A second broad feature was that the Governments of India would draw their authority by direct devolution from the Crown as the Dominion Governments did—a necessary preliminary to, and the best augury for, the full attainment by India of that political character enjoyed by the most developed Dominions. The Viceroy urged that nothing was to be gained by working the Constitution in a spirit of mere destruction or by the abandonment of constitutional methods, whereas everything was to be gained by taking up the proffered role of a consolidated India and full political personality, and by developing the Constitution till it shed in due season the limitations designed for the period of its growth.

Lord Willingdon then made a reference to his successor. After dwelling on Lord Linlithgow's great techical knowledge of the new Constitution and his sympathy with Indian aspirations, he referred to the shadow of communal strife hanging over India, which was a cause of constant anxiety to all Governments in India. He appealed for tolerance and good will, and announced that the Criminal Law Amendment Bill would be brought before the Assembly again in the recommended form. These powers were essential in view of dangerous subversive movements and communal unrest, and in view of the necessity of ensuring that the transfer of the primary responsibility for maintaining peace and good government in the Provinces to the new Ministries should take place in conditions most favorable to their stability and success.

After Lord Willingdon's speech the President of the Legislative Assembly read a message from the Governor-General recommending that the Criminal Law Amendment Bill be passed as originally introduced. The Assembly had refused to consider the Bill on Friday. During the reading of the message the Congress Party did not stand, as is customary, and when the Home Member, Sir Henry Craik, moved for leave to reintroduce the Bill Mr. Desai, leader of the party, opposed, contending that it would be a mockery if all that the Assembly existed for was to register decrees of the Executive.

Swedish Portia Tells of Keeping Families Intact

Pleas For Divorce Heard By Mediators Who Often Prevent Break

Domestic relations work in connection with court procedures in Sweden has accomplished much in adjusting family problems and particularly in avoiding divorces, according to Mrs. Sonja Branting, prominent attorney from Stockholm and daughter of Hjalmar Branting, who for three years was Prime Minister of Sweden.

Mrs. Branting, who has been active in building up the Swedish Legal Aid Society, which has a function similar to that of the American Legal Aid Society, arrived at New York recently for a lecture tour.

"My work is that of a 'mediator,' whose duty it is to interview persons who believe they want to be divorced, with an effort toward establishing their reconciliation," she said, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Are Three Mediators

"There are three mediators, one man and two women, appointed by the Governor of Stockholm. Last year, I persuaded about 25 per cent of those living under strained relations to try again. As far as I know—and in many instances I have seen the clients since—they have remained together."

There are exceptions, Mrs. Branting continued, particularly when the welfare of children is involved, in which she does not use her influence to prevent a divorce.

"But our laws in Sweden try to make it possible for persons to be divorced without appearing in court, provided each of the two parties has appeared before a mediator. Then they need only sign the petition for a separation and send it through a lawyer. A separation judgment is granted and after one year of trial, during which they sometimes decide to reverse their decision, a regular divorce is effected.

Relations Are Changing

"Family relations are changing fast, owing to the whole structure of the home being altered. I don't think that all women are going outside the home more than formerly because they want to. It is because economic laws force them to. I think it is ideal for a man and woman to be together. But this arrangement must be rooted in understanding and love of each other, and not be on economic basis."

Mrs. Branting spoke in high praise of the methods used by Children's Court Justice Jacob Panken here in a trial which she witnessed.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

A Tamed Porcupine

Though the porcupine is a docile, peaceable little animal when left to go his own way, he is, by reason of his powerfully defensive quills, feared by man and beast alike, when stirred to battle. Only in very rare instances have zoologists been able to tame a porcupine to any degree, but A. Dean Lindsay, of Tampa, Florida and Hollidaysburg, Pa., has one that he has tamed and domesticated himself. He keeps it around his home at all times, and carries it with him wherever he goes.

The Narrowest Building

What Philadelphians believe to be the narrowest building is a tiny, structure located on the S. E. corner of 15th and South Penn Square. The architect had a plot of ground just 4 feet wide and 75 feet long to build on, and the finished building measures exactly 43 inches wide and 50 feet long, housing a small counter lunch and soft drink stand, capable of accommodating 20 people at a time. And tiny as it is, the building has its own heating plant and mechanical equipment.

French Control Of Djibouti Is Told By Writer

Much Whipcracking By Colonizers Who Feel They Must Civilize The Native

"Djibouti! What an explosive name!

"It pops and splutters like a camp fire. It sizzles as Djibouti itself and the desert sands surrounding it.

"Yet I was elated reach here. It was the end of a voyage. It was a destination and a new place to explore," writes R. H. Markham staff correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, whose story follows:

Best of all it was a fabled town, surrounded with fantasies and wreathed in all the lure that a restless imagination could weave about it.

For two weeks, in anticipation of this voyage, I had been reading of Ethiopia, of her King of Kings, of the Lion of Judah and of the last free African state. I had seized book after book in English, German and French, preferably French (because they are the cheapest), and in every one I had found a chapter on Djibouti. It was the gateway into the empire of Haile Selassie. It was the hottest place in the world. It was a model of intrepid French colonization. It was inhabited by handsome brown men and beautiful women. It was the threshold of Africa, although at the back door. It was a French watch-tower set in blazing sands.

Incisive Refrain

Like the knock of car wheels on the ends of steel rails, there had run through my mind the incisive refrain: Djibout'—Djibout'—Djibout'. And here it was at last.

And it didn't matter that our boat was two hours late. Its engine had gone wrong and left us sitting on the placid, motionless waters of the Red Sea, like a dream ship on an ocean of glass. But we had repaired the defect and, steaming through the narrow strait which nearly closes the lower end of the Red Sea, we slowly skirted the grim and desolate island rock of Perim which towers across to both sandy shores of the converging mainlands and constitutes one more of nature's fortresses by which Great Britain controls so many of the world's waterways.

It is another defiant, far-flung English outpost. No tree softens the fierce and torried grayness of the rocks. No verdant gardens rest the weary eyes. One can barely discern gray-stone houses on a gray-stone islands, where lonely soldiers sit to guard an empire.

But other powers were also making empires and did not leave all the strategic points to Britain. The French bought from a local chief, for $10,000, the barren and inhospitable port of Obock on the African coast, across from Perim. But it so completely resisted all the efforts which they made to develop it that they seized a better site along the same coast, which they have succeeded in turning into a city. This is Djibouti: yellow French sands answering gray English rocks.

As we cast anchor about a mile from the pier, a single row of lights was gleaming from the shore and a effulgent African moon, amid flaming African stars, illuminated the whole harbor. For the first time I saw the spell which the dark continent casts over the heavens. Of course, it may be only my fantasy. It may be by imagination, fed by yearnings for distant loved ones. But whatever the cause, East Africa transforms the heavenly lights. The stars come close to earth. When they first appear in the gray of the evening they burn like great, lone candles in a church. You can see them flicker and scintillate. One by one they burst into radiance, as though someone were lighting a cosmic Christmas tree, until the whole heavens are filled with glowing lamps that hover kindly over all.

Africa goes to bed very early; men make no sounds and light no lights in order that the barren sands, the buoyant jungles and triumphant forests may be left alone to keep their tryst with the soft, wooing stars.

The queen among all these lights is the majestic African moon. When the heavens are clear the stars almost pale before her effulgence. When there are little, frail clouds she turns them into silver lace. She transforms them into translucent carpets sailing over the earth. When there are dense, black clouds, she bursts them asunder with her explosive rays and sends a million flaming moonbeams burning their way through jagged silver craters amid the magnificent ruins of vapors that dared defy her.

A New Lure

This moon added a new lure to my fabled city. Late as it was, our boat was soon surrounded by a score of little craft that had come out to meet us. Hungry, agile black boys scrambled up the stairway and poured onto the ship, in order to seel postcards and matches. Agents from the hotels swarmed after them, followed by armies of porters. All was wild confusion. Order disappeared and authority vanished. Officials took our passports and agents took our baggage. I was caught in a tempest and as the human currents surged about me I clutched my typewriter, held a hand tightly over my most important pocket, and—reveled in French Somaliland.

There was a babel of strident voices. White men struck black boys. The waves of an ocean of subdued and thwarted peoples surged up to me. I saw a brutal sort of mastery resting on sheer force.

I flowed down a human stream into a little motor boat and we started for shore. Six black boys stood as a rim of bronze statues on the stern. Their ragged clothes, that had once been white, fluttered in the wind. Two roughly-wrapped turbans and four fuzzy heads, were depicted sharply against the sky. Immovable, incomprehensible, irrepressible, frustrated colonists. Could they be like my boy? They seemed to be neglected waifs cast up upon the glowing sands of a disordered continent.

Like Machines

Beside us three long, lithe brown men were rapidly rowing a large boat with huge pairs of oars. They bent to the task, sweat glistened on their bare bodies, their muscles contracted and expanded like steel springs. They kept up with us. Those strange, inarticulate men matched our machine. And all that for a pittance, for a new crumbs of coarse bread. They were cheaper than iron and steam. They were as the grandsons of galley slaves, held for millenniums in the invisible chains of historical development. Black, gaunt, powerful Somali-men, who own nothing but their rags and sleep on sands that never cool.

As we reached the shore, black policemen beat back porters and vendors with whips. Force in its crudest form was master. Human self-respect was gone. Blows kept disorder from becoming complete chaos. Authority resided in lashes.

After a very long time we reached a hotel that was far from unattractive and whose manager was as astoundingly efficient as though he had been the Emperor of Djibouti. Our baggage finally arrived, we recovered our passports from genial policemen and found men from India to change our money—all after midnight on Sunday.

Contrary to all predictions, the weather was not unbearably hot, and the rule of my first African night was upon me. So, late as it was, I found a Somali-boy who knew a little French, and he took me about the town.

New American Legion Head Predicts Bonus

and some applause, sought to say that he was not the author of the Patman bill. He said that at least 150 other Representatives in Congress claimed co-authorship and he ended with a declaration that he was for the Legion, first, last and always, and wanted immediate payment of the bonus regardless of the method of raising the money to defray its costs

Ray Murphy of Iowa, elected commander to succeed Mr. Belgrano, said that he expected to spend considerable time in Washington next Winter "to put over our program."

"We are going to put over the Legion program, and that is all we will ask of Congress," he declared.

St. Louis found that for the $30,000 spent to prepare for the Legion, decorate streets, erect stands, &c., the legionaires and visitors had left from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 in cash.

"Hotels, taverns and breweries," one newspaper said, "derived the greatest benefit, while clothing and department stores reaped the least."

Railroads Profited

Railroads and other transportation agencies obtained much revenue.

Commander Belgrano and other Legion officials praised the city for its hospitality, and had an especial word for the Police Department and its excellent handling of the throngs. Mayor Dickmann returned the praise. The police took into custody many pickpockets and other police characters and kept them locked up until the legionaires had departed.

Despite the boisterous conduct of many of the visitors, hotel operators and police said that the total "damage" was negligible. Some of the visitors thought it was fun to throw water from hotel windows. Some also tore up telephone directories and scattered the bits into the street.

"Telephone directories are cheap, and anyhow, it is time for the new one," a hotel man said. "The other things that were damaged do not amount to much. They were the best type of fellow we could expect; they were just celebrating again."

The Duke's Starvation

Frederick August, ruling Duke of Anhalt-Zerbst (1734-1793), who was the brother of Empress Catherine II of Russia, was in Luxemburg when he learned of the execution of King Louis XVI of France on January 21, 1793. He was so shocked at this blow to royal dignity that he immediately started on a complete fast of 43 days, which ended with his death from starvation in March, 1793.

The Duke is famous as the man who sold 1,160 of his soldiers to England, for the purpose of fighting the American "rebels" in the Revolutionary War.

The Roving House

Since 1891, L. F. Martin's home in Hollis, Okla., has been in four different counties, four townships, two States and one territory, yet it has never been moved. During the years of growth and development in Oklahoma and Northern Texas, all boundary lines were shifted hither and yon, and Mr. Martin's homestead being peculiarly located, he scarcely knew from day to day where he was. Without moving, he has lived in Texas, Oklahoma Territory, Oklahoma State, in counties Greer, Unassigned, Greer and Harmon. The four townships were: Duke, Martin, Looney and Hollis.

Canadians Seek More Trade With United States to 30, dolls and toys from 40 to 30.

Tariff experts in both countries are now studying methods of determining the value of merchandise for duty purposes in either country. The countries have different ways of fixing protection and of preventing dumping or selling of goods in another country at less than cost of production and a fair profit in order not to glut the domestic market. To prevent dumping Canada ascertains the fair market value in the country of production and if the goods are sent in at prices lower than that, a dumping duty equal to the entire difference between the fair market price and the invoice price is levied. In the United States the dumping of cheap goods is stopped by invoking a quota system.

Now that there is so much will to negotiate a reciprocal trade treaty, there should be little difficulty in finding a way to iron out all difficulties, to the substantial benefit of both countries.

Stokowski To Give New American Works

Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, has detailed his plans for presenting an extensive group of new works, many by American composers, during the coming season, which opened on Oct. 4.

The new compositions on which he is drawing for his concerts include "Short Symphony" by Aaron Copland, which Mr. Stokowski characterizes as "a symmetrical in rhythm and very difficult"; "Romantic Symphony," by Charles Wittel, a Pennsylvania composer, which he says is "quite a big work, composed onnew lines"; "In Hutungs of Peking," sent to him by Avshalomoff, a Russian composer, which is founded on music played or sung by the Chinese; "Orchestra Variations" by Manc Blitzstein, a Philadelphia composer, and "Korsan Sketch" and "A Chinese Legend," by Henry Eichheim of Santa Barbara.

Other new works are "Erewhon," by Alois Reiser, another California composer; "Jazz Fugue," by Martin Gould; "Rumba Symphony" and "Cycle of Lamentation," by Dr. Harl McDonald, Professor of Music at the University of Pennsylvania; a composition by the Chicago composer Brooks; "Argentine Dance," by Estrada of Argentina; a concerto for two pianos by Poulenc, contemporary French composer, and "Tango," an Italian composition.

The conductor expressed regret at the resignation of Willem Van den Berg, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who will become assistant conductor and first 'cellist of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"----by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Master Of His Jail

Mayor "Bossy" Gillis, of Newburyport, Mass., landed in the county jail of this city for the violation of a minor law a few years ago. Afterward, he learned that the jail he had been confined in was for sale. "That was the toughest jail house I was ever in", said His Honor. "I am going to make sure that I'll never get put there again." He put in a bid and purchased the jail outright, as his private property.

SAI SHOKI INTERPRETS DANCE

sisted of 3 kotos played by women, and sho, drum and flute performers of gagaku. Priests in the robes of their sect sang a Buddhist hymn, and there was an accompaniment of pilgrims' bells held in the hands of women in ordinary dress. It is said to be the first time that real priests have appeared upon the stage.

Gagaku Orchestra

The music and singers were, therefore, an odd combination, but the effect was astonishingly good. With the chorus and orchestra kneeling on the stage to the right as atmosphere and support, the dancers led by Tamami Hanayagi performed. They wore white nun's robes with over-garments of sheer black, and white satin veils over their heads, rosaries in hand. The grouping of the figures was statuesque and showed a sense of form in the western style of the dance, but at moments there was monotony and a feeling of experimenting in a new sphere for the first time.

Many charming dances were given by Tamami Hanayagi's pupils which showed the teacher's desire to break away from Kabuki conventions. Miss Mineko Hirai sang the descriptive songs to the accompaniment of the piano, and the children in appropriate costumes interpreted the meaning of the songs. In "Masakado", Tamami Hanayagi was seen as the ghostly courtesan, Takiyasha Hime, and Sukezo as Mitsukuni. The fantastic dance as conclusion was produced by Ryo Tanaka, words by Yoshikaru Toki and music by Machida Kasho.

Dr. Thomas Barclay Dies At Age of 86

Well Known Missionary Spent 60 Years In Service In Far East

From the London Times

To few missionaries is it given to spend 60 years in service in the East; yet that is the record of the Rev. Thomas Barclay, D.D., of the Presbyterian Church of England Mission at Tainan, Formosa, who died there on October in his eighty-sixth year. Though very ill last March, he recovered sufficiently to be present at the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of his arrival in Formosa, which was also the seventieth anniversary of the foundation of the mission in 1865.

Born in Glasgow on November 21, 1849, he was he son of George Barclay, warehouseman. From the Glasgow Collegiate School he passed into Glasgow University, where he was one of the most brilliant students of a brilliant period. He gained special distinction in the natural philosophy classes of Sir William Thomson (afterwards Lord Kelvin). Two of his fellow students became, like himself, distinguished missionaries of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Campbell Gibson of Swatow, and Dr. D. Mackichan, Principal of the Wilson College, Bombay.

Following a suggestion made by Professor Thomson in a lecture to the Royal Society, he and Campbell Gibson presented a paper to the society on the specific inductive capacity of dialectrics as far back as 1870. Dr. Barclay used to recall with pride the fact that he was the last student to be capped M.A. in the Old College at Glasgow before the University was transferred to Gilmorchill, and that the Vice-Chancellor who capped him was his namesake, Principal Barclay.

Though tempted to devote his life to scientic studies, Barclay decided to become a foreign missionary, and took the full course of theological training at the Free Church College in Glasgow, attending lectures also at Leipzig University. He offered himself to the Presbyterian Church England for service in China, was ordained in 1874, and arrived at Takow, Formosa, in the folowing year. In 1877 he was stationed at Tainan, Formosa, where he labored for more than 50 years, only taking short furloughs at home. When he arrived the young native Church was at a critical stage.

As a result of the work of his pioneer predecessors of the Dutch Reformed Church, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the missionaries of his own Church, so many converts had been attracted by the new religion that the greatest problem was how to teach the comparatively ignorant and often unstable hill tribesmen and to organize them into a strong Christian community. To these tasks Barclay brought high intellectual gifts, wise judgment, and bright enthusiasm. With his colleagues he organized on broad lines a college for training teachers and pastors, and awakened among the young Christian Churches higher ideas of the far-reaching importance of the Gospel they had accepted. Church organization based on Presbyterian lines has now developed and consolidated the efforts of the first preachers.

Barclay's first step was to acquire a good command of the language, in which he became one of the most accomplished scholars. He soon recognized that the earlier version of the Scriptures in the Amoy vernacular of Chinese, which is used in Formosa, had been prepared under great difficulties, published in portions from 1852, and were still tentative translations. But it was not till 1885 that he began definitely to undertake his greatest contribution to the welfare of the Church in Formosa. In that year he succeeded an English Presbyterian colleague as secretary of an Amoy Bible Revision Committee composed of members of the three missions then working in the district—the English Presbyterian Mission, the London Missionary Society, and the American Baptist Mission—and representative native scholars. This joint revision committee aimed at producing a version which would be scholarly and yet not above the common people, printed in the Roman characters which now had become common in the district, a true vernacular Bible. The main work of revision fell upon Barclay. The Amoy New Testament in its new form was published in 1916, and was at once recognized as one of the most accurate and most acceptable missionary translations in the East. But Barclay was not content with this. He produced in 1923 a supplement to Dr. Carstairs Douglas's dictionary of the Amoy vernacular, and when he went back to the East in 1926, in his seventy-seventh year, he set himself to make a final revision of the translation of the whole Old Testament. That task he completed on the last day of December, 1930.

In the changed political circumstances when Formosa was ceded by China to Japan in 1895 Barclay's sanctified common sense was of great value. During his long life in the East he made numerous friends among Orientals, and maintained the most delightful relationships with his colleagues, who, old and young, frequently testified to the charm of his sociable brotherliness. His name was honored in every part of his large district, and his influence naturally increased as year after year he devoted himself reverently to the missionary task to which he dedicated his life.

From the Emperor of Japan he received the Order of the Rising Sun in 1897; his university gave him the honorary degree of D.D.; the British and Foreign Bible Society, which published his translations, made him an honorary life governor; and his Church elected him as Moderator of its General Assembly in 1921, the first General Assembly of the English Presbyterian Church, taking the place of the former Synod. Dr. Barclay married, in 1892, a daughter of Mr. William M. Turner. They had no children.

Anglo-Japanese Accord

By Admiral ISAMU TAKESHITA

It is my firm conviction that the maintenance and improvement of Japanese-American friendship in the future is a duty, the faithful performance of which should be looked upon by the citizens of our two countries as a privilege and an honor. If we are faithful to that duty then may the Pacific Ocean, true to its name, become a permanent symbol of peace whose influence will in time encompass the whole world.

Il Duce's Sayings Give Idea Of Aims In Africa

the mission of colonization which for several centuries had made it great. If Europe was not worthy, the hour of its decadence had struck. . . . Was the League to be the tribunal before which the negroes, backward people, and savages of the world could arraign the great nations which had revolutionized and transformed humanity?

Ten days later, in the Popolo d'Italia, he took occasion to explain that the "Ethiopians are not negroes." The "essential argument" in support of Italian policy was not the abolition of slavery, nor even civilization, both of which would be only the consequences of Italian action.

The essential arguments, absolutely unanswerable, are two: the vital needs of the Italian people and their security in East Africa. Put in military terms the Italo-Ethiopian problem is simple and logical. It admits with Geneva, without Geneva, against Geneva, but one solution.

On August 23 he granted another interview, this time to the Daily Mail, in which he said:—

"If the League of Nations were so reckless as to expand a remote colonial campaign into a general European war, which would open wide the door to every unsatisfied ambition on the Continent or even thorughout the world—and it would cost this time not millions but tens of millions of lives—then it would be upon the League that the guilt would rest."

A Present Of Weapons

In the same interview the Duce claimed that for 13 years Italy had behaved "in a consistently friendly manner towards Ethiopia," even to the extent (since the 20-year Treaty of Friendship and Arbitration of 1928) of making "her a present of large quantities of modern weapons." "Should I have done that," he asked. "If I had had hostile intentions against her?" Inconsistently, he then went on to say:—

The Italian nation is following with discipline and enthusiasm the part played for it by the regime. The undeserved defeat of Adowa is a wound from which the heart of the Italian people has been smarting for 40 years. It must now be healed once for all.

The Duce in September betrayed still more clearly his growing consciousness of what was being "said beyond our frontiers," notwithstanding that he had declared he would take no account of it. Separate interviews with him appeared in the Matin on September 16, in the Morning Post on September 17, and in the Daily Mail on September 10. To the Matin he said that nobody could have the illusion any longer that he "was playing a game of poker." He referred to the "sincere and faithful friendship" which Italy had maintained with Great Britain for many years, and added:—

"We find it monstrous that a nation which dominates the world refuses to us a wretched plot of ground in the African sun. . . . The interests for which she is opposing us are other interests, and she does not say so.

Fruitful Colonies"

To the Morning Post he declared that "Italy must have fruitful colonies," reaffirmed that Italy demanded security and expansion, and made the strange and unwarranted charge that he was forced to take direct action in part because of the "British Government's inclination to block off every just demand of Italy for satisfaction." The series of interviews may be rounded off with one granted to the Petit Journal on Sunday, in which the Duce, referring to British suggestions for a settlement, said: "I had to refuse suggestions which took into account neither our vital interests nor our national honor."

Signor Grandi's footnote on Corfu may fittingly be paralleled with a footnote on Ethiopia. On October 17, 1887, the British Government entrusted G. H. Portal, then her Britannic Majesty's Agent and Consul-General at Zanzibar, with a mission to Ethiopia to attempt to bring about a "pacification" between King John and the Italians. In January of that year a small force of Italians had been defeated by an overwhelming force of Ethiopians in a fight which was nothing more than a massacre. In his account of the mission Portal described the cry of venegeance which arose on the news of the massacre reaching Italy. He went on:—

"War of Revenge"

"As the summer months went on, the first violence of the outburst began to subside; the eager, almost hysterical, passion for revenge, so easily aroused in Italy, began to give place to calmer and perhaps more reasonable considerations. Men began to inquire more closely into the matter, and to count the cost; and, as they did so, the serious nature of the undertaking which lay before Italy became more and more apparent; a war of revenge could bring but little practical benefit and would cost many millions of pounds and probably many hundreds of valuable lives; in the meantime Italy's action in Europe would be cramped proportionately to the magnitude of her task in Africa, and in the actual state of European politics it was most desirable, and might at any moment become imperatively necessary, that the hands of Italy should be free."

The words used to describe the position in October, 1887, are not inapplicable to the position in October, 1935.

St. Mary's Scores, 20-0

N. Y. Times

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 29.—St. Mary's Galloping Gaels gained a measure of revenge today for a humiliating 9-to-7 football upset last year when they defeated their 1934 conquerors from the University of Nevada, 20 to 0.

Outplayed for most of the first period by a Nevada eleven that produced surprising early strength, the stalwarts coached by smiling Slip Madigan found the range and later ripped through the opposing defense much as they pleased.

The longest individual run of the game, a 56-yard dash by fullback Floyd Maxham with an intercepted pass, brought a St. Mary's touchdown in the second period.

About 25,000 fans watched the game

Mr. J. L. Graham was made secretary and George Hayes was re-elected treasurer. Commander Ross of the British Embassy was elected the new member of the committee. Re-elected to the men's committee were Mr. K. P. Kirkwood of the Canadian Legation, Mr. J. Francis Harris and Mr. H. V. Bleackley.

Miss Caroline MacMahon is the only new member of the women's auxiliary committee. She replaces Mrs. E. Lewis and Mrs. L. V. Allen. Lady Clive is convener of the committee. Other members re-elected are Mrs. J. Day Mason, Mrs. Burton Crane, Mrs. E. S. Kirkham, Mrs. P. Marr-Johnson, and Mrs. David Selwin Tait.

Tryouts for this season's work will be held at the American Embassy next Thursday, October 31 when anyone wanting to act in a coming play is invited to be present.

No plays have as yet been scheduled for the new season. A discussion of how to contact new talent and new members was included in the business meeting.

CARNIVAL POSTPONED

The carnival which the International Ladies Benevolent Association had planned for next Saturday, November 1, has been postponed until November 8, the following Saturday. The postponement was made because November 1 has been declared a holiday and many persons are planning to go out of town for the week-end.

A new plan added to the arrangements for the carnival is that for a Christmas Present Booth. It will have for sale many brocade objects, especially made for the carnival which will be suitable for gifts to be sent home. Mrs. J. D. Hitch is in charge of this booth. There will also be a cocktail bar.

INTERNATIONAL SKATING CLUB OPENING

Skaters are urged to reserve Friday evening, November 8 for the opening of the 1935-'36 season of the International Skating Club of Tokyo and Yokohama, at the Shibaura Rink. The rink has been renovated and certain reconstruction has taken place, making it an attractive place in which to spend an evening. The loudspeakers have been placed at the end of the Rink (thus eliminating an unpleasant echo), and the club has purchased new records.

Season tickets, which will be obtainable at the rink, will cover a series of 10 skating nights on the following dates:

November 8, 15, 22, 29
December 6, 13, 20
January 10, 17, 24.

Senior season tickets at a cost of ¥10, will entitle the bearers to skate between the hours of 8 and 11. Junior members (under 17 years of age) will have the option of buying a junior ticket for ¥5, which will entitle them to skate from 8 to 10, or buying a senior ticket.

MISS BERNARDINNE DIES

Miss S. Bernardinne, honorary director of the Shinai Girls' High School of Osaka, died Friday. She was sent to Japan as a missionary of the Enfant Jesus Catholique Association of France 58 years ago. Since then she worked persistently for social improvement and better living. Arriving in Osaka in 1876, she took some 11 orphans and taught them. In 1908, she established the Shinai Girls' High School in Osaka and until today some 1,500 students were instructed by her.

For her distinguished services of education and of relief works, she was recognized three times by the Osaka Prefectural Office. She was 83 years old at the death.

Nagoya Preparing For Gigantic Pan-Pacific Peace Exposition

Mr. Isao Oiwa, mayor of Nagoya, extended an invitation to the Pan Pacific club to visit the Pan Pacific Peace Exposition to be held there in 1937 at the weekly luncheon at the Imperial hotel Friday noon.

Other speakers were Mr. G. Alsot, representative of Havas Press Agency in Paris, and Mr. J. N. Friyvhmsn, first secretary of the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. who gave a glowing account of conditions in his country. Mr. S. Saito presided.

Speaking for the city of Nagoya, Mr. Oiwa declared:

"The third largest in the empire, exceeded only by Tokyo and Osaka, the City of Nagoya is a modern industrial centre which is rapidly advancing and developing. It has a population of 1,800,000. Its industrial production is valued at 1,000 million yen a year. It does an annual foreign trade worth well over 200 million yen.

"The remarkable growth of Nagoya as a modern industrial centre has been made possible by a combination of factors which are essential to all really successful industrial developments. It has climatic, geographical and other natural advantages equalled by few cities, besides an abundance of cheap electricity for motive power. Its population is industrious, honest and capable. Its labor is hardworking and patient. Its capital and labor relations are marked by very little friction.

"Every branch of modern industry thrives in Nagoya. The city is a center of cotton spinning and weaving, woolen manufacturing, porcelain and other industries. In 1933 the Nagoya district was responsible for 14 per cent of Japan's entire cotton yarn production, 27 per cent of cotton piece goods, 32 per cent of woolen manufactures, and 55 per cent of porcelain.

"In the absence of adequate harbor facilities the local foreign trade has been conducted up to the present time through the medium of trading firms located in other ports. To eliminate this handicap the prefecture voted a 37 million yen harbour improvement project and work has been going on vigorously for some time. When it is completed in 1937 the port of Nagoya will possess the most comprehensive docking and berthing facilities, with accommodation for 66 vessels of 20,000 tons each simultaneously. The authorities, not content with this improvement, however, are already working over a plan for further betterment, to be started on the termination of the present undertaking two years hence. When such harbour improvement work is well under way Nagoya's share in the nation's foreign trade is bound to increase tremendously.

"As a great centre of cotton and wool spinning and weaving, wood working, flour milling and poultry industries, Nagoya and adjacent areas also serve as a great outlet for their raw materials; wool, raw cotton, wheat, lumber and cereals, which are imported chiefly from the countries bordering on the Pacific and India. The waterborne commerce of Nagoya with foreign countries will be heavy both ways.

"Besides being a business and manufacturing centre, Nagoya is famous for its numerous spots of scenic beauty and of historical interest. As the birthplace of a number of great men of history, Nagoya and vicinity abound in places rich in historic associations. To say nothing of the majestic Atsuta Shrine, there are the architectural splendour of Nagoya Castle, the sliding picture screens of the old Detached Palace, the famous collections of old documents and manuscripts preserved at Osu and the Seven Temples, all of which are priceless legacies from ancient Japan. Shooting Kisogawa rapids, cormorant fishing in Nagara River, and a visit to the seashore of Gamigori and the Gero hot springs will provide the tourists with thrills and entertainment unrivalled anywhere else.

"The Pan Pacific Peace Exposition of Nagoya in 1937 is to be held to commemorate the completion of the various modern facilities of vast scope, which Nagoya is installing at tremendous expense in an effort to make the city what it should be as a foremost modern entrepot of world standard. By the time the Exposition preparation is well under way, the harbor improvement program will have been completed. A 27 million yen work for reconstructing Nagoya railway station will be ready to receive visitors to the Fair from all parts of the world. By that time Nagoya will also have ready an airport, a tourist hotel, a modern prefectural office edifice and Higashiyama Park, with its botanical and zoological gardens; work along these lines has either been started already or is about to start shortly. The Exposition will be open for 78 days from March 15 to May 31. Every support has been pledged to the enterprise by the Aichi prefectural authorities, the Nagoya Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the national government, and many prominent organizations and individuals."

Speaking of world affairs today, Mr. Alsot said in part:

"Nowadays you cannot open a paper or walk in the streets without hearing the word "war" twenty times a day. But those who fought in the last war and took part in battles such as Verdun, and who can guess what the next war may be like, those who have seen their comrades die a dreadful death but have escaped themselves, can only be deeply sad at the present situation of the world, for they know, what after all everyone knows, that war will not solve anything."

RETURNS FROM VISIT

Madame Ochimi Kubushiro, Director of the Japan W.C.T.U., who left Japan last May for the United States and Brazil for the purpose of inspecting conditions there, arrived here Friday afternoon from Voncouver aboard the N.Y.K. liner Hiye Maru.

Interviewed by the press the Christian social worker stated that in the United States she studied various social measures, later visiting for inspection South American countries including Brazil. The abolition of public prostitution in Japan should be effected at the earliest possible date to display to the full extent the strength of this country, she said.

She studied problems in regard to the second generation Japanese in the American Continent, she said. Her impression was that if they work only half as hard as their fathers and mothers, splendid success will undoubtedly be reaped.

Moscow Uses News to Suit Its Own Ends

Text Of United States Note Protesting Comintern Activities Buried

A dictatorship's power to withhold important information from its people was never better illustrated than in the interchange of notes and statements concerning the activities of the Communist International between the Governments of the United States and Soviet Russia—which were accompanied by verbal protests from Great Britain, Italy, Latvia, Japan and China, says a staff correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor from Moscow. His story follows:

Russia's controlled press did not publish the texts of the American note protesting against the Comintern Congress, nor of the Soviet reply and Cordell Hull's statement. No mention was made of the American protest at the time it was made public elsewhere, but a few days later a very brief and misleading summary of the note was published simultaneously with a similar summary of the Soviet reply. The Soviet public is not yet aware that verbal protests were made by other countries.

Misleading

The summary of the American note was misleading because it failed to make clear how vigorous the American protest had been, and the impression was subtly conveyed that the Soviet reply had satisfied the United States Government and that the matter was closed.

Concerning Mr. Hull's statement, the Soviet press carried only the following report:

"WASHINGTON—A statement by Secretary of State Hull on the exchange of notes between W. Bullitt, U. S. Ambassador in Moscow, and N. N. Krestinsky, Acting People's Commissar of Foreign Affairs, on the question of the activities of the Communist International, has been published in the American press. Mr. Hull's statement deals in detail with the viewpoint of the American Government as formulated in the abovementioned note of the U. S. Government."

Not Exceptional

This is not an exceptional instance of the treatment of foreign events by Russia's controlled press. During the past 18 months, for example, there have been several diplomatic interchanges between the Japanese and Soviet Governments. Japanese notes were never published until Soviet replies were made, and in some cases Japanese notes were suppressed altogether. The Soviet student of international relations obviously cannot obtain comprehensive material from his own press.

The ruling Communist Party, which completely controls every newspaper published in Russia, pictures the world for its people by systematic methods well understood by Soviet correspondents abroad, who are all well-tested Communists. The press gains its effects by suppression and selection rather than by falsification. Every item of news is selected with the purpose of reinforcing the Communist thesis that the world of "capitalism" is collapsing and the world of "socialism" advancing.

Admit "Coloring" News

Russian Communists are amused rather than annoyed by "bourgeois" accusations that they "color" the news. As a rule, they will frankly admit that their press is manipulated to serve their own purposes, and that they never hesitate to suppress any item of news which they do not desire their public to know about. The Soviet reading public thus obtains a picture of the world carefully sketched out by a few men in the Kremlin, who contemptuously describe freedom of the press as a "bourgeois hypocrisy."

While open falsification of news events is rare in the Soviet press, Soviet correspondents frequently resort to doubtful methods to gain the desired effects. There are times when the Kremlin desires to portray certain countries in the worst possible light. During the period of friction with Japan, for example, the writer, who is familiar with Chinese newspapers, was amazed to discover that the Soviet press prominently displayed reports credited a utterly unreliable and obscure Chinese newspapers, which no conscientious "bourgeois" correspondent in China would dream of taking seriously. And such reports, when events prove them false, are never denied in the Soviet press.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Big Pot

The Big Pot of Bunzlau, in German Silesia, which furnishes the emblem of this city of potters, has a romantic background.

In 1753, a potter's assistant, named Joppe, wooed his master's daughter. Before the proud father gave his consent, he required the aspirant to make a pot of a capacity of 30 bushels of peas. The assistant executed the order to the master's satisfaction and married the girl. Ever since, the Big Pot of Bunzlau has been kept in the museum of the city.

Infra-Red Rays Used to Detect Raiding Planes

Detector, Invented By Commanders MacNeil Submitted To British War Office

An aircraft detector using infra-red ray has been submitted for tests to the British War Office.

The device is the invention of Commander Paul MacNeil. The infra-red rays are the longer heat waves of light. The detector, it is claimed, when pointed skywards causes the rays to record any change of temperature made by a body passing across them. These rays can then be amplified as high as 8,000,000 times.

With this amplification, it is said, a ship passing across the beam has been detected when more than 12 miles distant, and aircraft hidden by fog when more than four miles away.

A great advantage claimed for this device over systems of aural detection is elimination of time-lag—that is, the time taken for the sound of an airplane to reach the ground. The instrument can be synchronized with an anti-aircraft gun so as to fire the latter at the instant when the distant aircraft crosses the beam.

It can also be used to register the distance and height of objects, its inventor says, and can be set so that bodies moving at a slower speed than those which are to be detected will be ignored.

During recent exercises on the South coast with ordinary detectors, which were intended to give practice to territorial units in the detection of hostile aircraft, it was found that not more than one raid in 10 would have met opposition. The searchlight operators seemed to be unable to co-ordinate their lights with the sound detectors, owing to the higher speed of present-day bombing aircraft.

Again during the practice air raids on London in July this year, it was reported that during one period of 12 hours, when the skies were favorable to the defense, only six of the raiding squadrons out of 78 were challenged by the defenders.

Managed Money Out Of Question For Great Britain

would have just cause for grievance if we were to move without the utmost circumspection in a matter which so nearly concerns their vital interests.

"So it does not seem to me the time has yet come when we can venture to tie our hands. We must wait a little longer, with such patience as we can muster, until the international sky is clearer and the dollar and the franc look one another in the face without a squint.

"Meantime, we are doing nothing to aggravate the situation. I might even say we have done something to mitigate it. We have never tried to depreciate the pound nor snatch commercial advantage from such a process and we never shall. We have never attempted to impose our monetary policy upon other people. We have contributed to the comparative stability of the sterling bloc, which in itself forms no small fraction of the surface of the globe.

"We have done something to bring back prosperity to our own country. So long as we freely buy the world's goods and freely pay for them that is the best contribution we can make to the prosperity of the world."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer's picture of British economic and financial recovery was overshadowed by the Italo-Ethiopian crisis and the prospect of largescale rearmament by Britain. Extra expenditures upon "defense," he said, would mean a smaller surplus at the end of the financial year.

He deplored the fact that foreign affairs "have introduced new sources of doubt and anxiety just at a time when the progress toward recovery seemed to be making definite headway over a large part of the world."

"I must say that up to now there has been exceedingly little sign of a check in our movement toward recovery," said Mr. Chamberlain. "Unemployment continues to decline even in the Summer months, when we have been accustomed to expect a rise; employment, judging by the numbers of insured persons and the employed, goes on breaking records, and it is picking up with the increase in population in a most satisfactory manner; the figures of export and retail trades, notes in circulation, bank clearings and bank advances all show substantial increases compared with the same period a year ago.

"It is only in new capital issues, which were continuously extending up to the end of July, that in August we received a definite check, due doubtless to the situation abroad."

Briefly, Mr. Chamberlain reaffirmed the foreign policy enunciated by Sir Samuel Hoare at Geneva and then launched into a discussion of Britain's impending rearmament. His words were even stronger than in his speech on the same subject at Kelso, Scotland, a week ago.

"The march of events in these last few months has made it abundantly clear that the known weakness of our defenses has seriously impaired our influence for peace in the councils of the world," said Mr. Chamberlain. "If we are to carry out the policy of which we believe the nation approves, if we are to pull our weight in the cause of peace, we must be given the means without which that end cannot be served. I do not believe the country—which I am convinced is with us heart and soul in our policy for the prevention of war and the re-establishment of confidence in the maintenance of peace—will refuse us the only method by which we can hope to achieve success.

"Meantime we need not and shall not relax our efforts to promote the flow of goods and services throughout the nations of the world, the blocking of which has so long retarded world recovery."

Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England, who made one of his infrequent speeches tonight, indicated he was disturbed by the huge amounts of gold leaving Europe in the last few weeks.

"Look east or west wherever one will," said Mr. Norman, "and we see, as we must, the gold escaping from Europe across the Atlantic week after week, if not day after day, and we can see how far we are from those settled conditions under which alone we can work.

Canadian Plane Patrol Watches Salmon Poacher

Aerial Eyes Now Protecting Fish Within Reach Easy Of Illegal Fishing

Aerial eyes now protect the salmon of British Columbia's mountainous coast. Air planes carrying fishery inspectors are the latest method whereby Canada's Department of Fisheries keeps poachers from the Pacific salmon fishing grounds and enforces conservation regulations at spawning time, says the Christian Science Monitor.

British Columbia's heavily indented coastline and numerous rivers and lakes among the mountains are particularly well suited for illegal fishing, with probable wiping-out of salmon as a result. Many snug coves and shelters in the bends of the rivers, together with the heavily forested lower mountain slopes, allow plenty of scope for comerical fishermen evading regulations as to size of net, closed season and even his license. The same benefits to the poacher are hindrance to the fishery inspectors, since long distances must be traveled by water and the putt-putt of a motor warns of the approach of a boat. Now that airplanes have been pressed into service, the poacher is becoming wary.

Planes can annihilate distance in this rugged region, crossing mountains from one river or lake to another. Eighty-mile water trips are cut down to 10-mile air trips by the pilots of Canadian Airways, Ltd., who operate the fishery patrols for the Canadian Government.

The flying inspectors can see for great distances ahead, even over mountain tops, and pick out a fishing vessel before the roar of the engine can warn the fishermen. Swooping down with engine cut off a plane can approach silently on a suspected poacher. The distance that nets are out from ship or shore can be noticed better from the air than from the water, as many a fisherman has found out since the aerial patrols went into action during the season from the latter part of June to October.

The salmon catch depends largely on the salmon runs of the previous years. To insure successive good salmon packs year in and year out, it is necessary that the fish be protected when they travel inland to the small mountain streams and hidden lakes to spawn. Patrols are now made in a few hours in comfort to these spawning areas, whereas formerly they took many days and included fighting through thorny underbrush for hours to reach hidden lakes and creeks where salmon laid their eggs.

24,000 Letters Per Hr. Handled By New Machine

British Post Office Making Tests At Brighton; 10 Sorters Used

A huge letter-sorting machine, the first of its kind in the country, is to be tested by the Post Office at the Brighton sorting office.

The machine is designed to obviate the repeated manipulation, or "double-handling" of letters, which is unavoidable under the present system of sorting, by hand into pigeon-holed boxes, according to The Observer, London. A sorter at the new machine can, by means of ingenious devices, consign a letter to any one of its 325 boxes, and thus by one operation dispose of the letter finally so far as Brighton is concerned. A sorter at the existing tables can divide his letters only in a preliminary way to forty-eight boxes, and the large proportion of items necessarily sorted to miscellaneous groups at this first handling must be transferred to other nests of forty-eight pigeon-holes for more individual selection before they can be despatched to their destinations.

The new machine is seventy feet long, twelve feet wide, and seven feet high. Practically the whole of this length on the floor level is occupied by the 650 boxes into which the letters fall after treatment by the sorters, who are seated on a platform above the machinery. A unit comprises 325 boxes, and letters posted and delivered in Brighton are sufficiently numerous to warrant provision of two identical, but separate, units—hence the 650 boxes.

When the machine is operating at a period of heavy pressure ten sorters are at work together. Each man is seated, with a keyboard in front of him similar to that of a typewriter, and his supplies of letters are sent to him by a rising conveyor belt from tables on the ground floor where stamping machines have postmarked and obliterated the postage stamps at the rate of 600 a minute.

A Hungry Monster

The keyboards cover a range of 325 numbers, and every town or area of importance has its own number—thus Eastbourne may be No. 23, Liverpool 260, or Norfolk 300. The letters are mechanically propelled towards the operator by a slowly moving belt, and he lifts each separately and drops it through an aperture with his right hand, at the same instant tapping the code number on his keyboard with his left hand. The letter falls into a rapidly moving box-shaped metal carrier and is conveyed to the storage receptacle indicated by the operator's directional number.

As each of the ten sorters can deal with at least forty letters a minute, and the machine has a total output of 24,000 finally sorted letters an hour, the masses of letters posted at Brighton during the early evening can be quickly disposed of.

Postal packets and large-sized letters cannot be accommodated by the machine and must continue to be dealt with by manual processes.

Although the sorting machine will eliminate the duplicated sorting of many thousands of letters daily, its effectiveness necessarily depends upon the skill and accuracy of the sorters who will operate it. The test is eagerly awaited by the Brighton staff, who realise that they are opening a new chapter in the history of postal sorting offices.

New Deal Holds Constitution Is Fading As Issue

Roosevelt Advisers Assert Republican Efforts To Stir Up Fight Fell Flat

President Roosevelt, in the avowed judgment of his chief political advisers, is riding out the storm over the Constitution. Friends aboard his transcontinental train reported inability to find that the Constitution issue had made much impression, according to Theodore C. Wallen in the New York Herald Tribune. These advices were followed up on October 5 by a statement from the Democratic National Committee, in the name of Charles Michelson, declaring that the issue was "passing out of the political picture."

The reason, Mr. Michelson said, was that "in the face of the steady increase in national prosperity, people could not be interested in absurd distortions of the President's attitude." James A. Farley, Democratic national chairman, speaking on October 5 in the Kentucky state campaign, charged that the Constitution issue was nothing but "cheap demagogy" put out by Hoover-type Republicans to defend special privilege.

The article dated October 5 from Washington D. C., continues:

In his weekly letter to newspapers throughout the United States Mr. Michelson asserted that "the professional spellbinders and strategy-mongers of the opposition party rarely refer to the Constitution issue, though for a time every Republican speech bristled with charges that the President was bent on wrecking the cornerstone in our structure of government."

Persons familiar with the Administration's campaign set-up consider it no coincidence that Mr. Farley and Mr. Michelson struck out simultaneously on this issue. In the development of the President's re-election strategy, Mr. Michelson, formerly a leading veteran Washington newspaper correspondent, has moved up to a position second only to the national chairman. At most of the White House press conferences, he sits behind Mr. Roosevelt. In the Hyde Park conferences to lay out the recent political trip, he sat in with Mr. Farley. His first weekly letter to newspapers, issued about a month ago, contained phrases and ideas strikingly similar to certain Presidential comments to private visitors at the White House. It also singled out for attack particular newspaper commentators whose names frequently come to Mr. Roosevelt's lips in satirical private conversation.

Moley Also Comments

The significance of these observations is to indicate that the present proclamations of the "passing" of the Constitution issue are in line with Mr. Roosevelt's plans, if not actually approved by him. While Raymond Moley, former No. 1 brain truster, protests his editorial objectivity, it was nevertheless remarked in political quarters that the current issue of his magazine and Mr. Michelson's present letter speak of corporation attempts to propagandize their stockholders, or employees, against the New Deal.

Mr. Moley devotes his entire editorial space to the kind of letter he would write in response to such attempts to influence political thinking of stockholders. Mr. Michelson quotes the following from a letter which he says "one of the big eastern industrialists" sent to every employee along with a copy of the Constitution:

"The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all departments into one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, real despotism. The Supreme Court was acutely conscious of this very trend of encroachment when it unanimously declared the N. R. A. unconstitutional. The newspaper publishers also feared for the freedom of the press when they protested a code that would have put them under Federal license."

Hoover Again Raises Issue

The Constitution issue is cited by some Republicans as likely to be their central issue in the Presidential campaign next year. Republican leaders deny that they have dropped it or played it down. It was pointed out that former President Hoover, in his speech today to the younger Republicans of eleven Western and intermountain states, repeated his charge of a New Deal attempt to "circumvent the Constitution," although he had set out to confine himself to the fiscal policies of the Roosevelt administration.

While the Constitution issue had been developing within Republican ranks for several months, the discussion about it was raised to its greatest intensity after Mr. Roosevelt's "horse and buggy" statement on the Supreme Court decision invalidating all the N. R. A. codes. In the light of the bad press the President received on that statement, some of his own advisers concluded that he had been ill-advised. He had in effect that if the Supreme Court's philosophy in the N. R. A. case was to dominate further major decisions on New Deal measures, it would be up to the people to decide between a retardation of recovery and a modernization of the Constitution to extend Federal powers further into the states.

Reiteration Avoided

In the light of the admittedly unfavorable reaction to the tone of the President's extemporaneous statement on the Supreme Court decision, he avoided a reiteration or comprehensive amplification of those views. Old line Democratic leaders whose own political fortunes are bound up with the President's appeared hopeful that the incident would blow over. In recent weeks, the New Deal emphasis has been on the perfect propriety of proposing amendment of the Constitution in the manner provided for in the Constitution itself. But, although challenged to do so, none of the New Dealers has undertaken to reduce to writing his idea of what the Constitutional amendment should be.

Mr. Michelson, the Democratic publicity ace, in his letter to newspapers today, said that the Republican Presidential spotlight had shifted from Colonel Frank Knox, of Chicago, to Governor Alf M. Landon of Kansas.

"Governor Landon's perhaps most tangible claim to availability," Mr. Michilson wrote, "is the anti-saloon vote. He campaigned for his governorship on the dry issue with the modest ambition indicated that ultimately he would accomplish the restoration of national prohibition. Senator Vandenberg's strength iles in the circumstance that he was for the New Deal, against the New Deal, and non-committal between times, and, therefore, ought to have friends on all sides. Moreover, Vandenberg, like Landon, survived the Roosevelt landslide, which was some survival, even in Michigan and Kansas."

Attacks "Impartial Forecast"

Mr. Micheison wrote that "the Liberty League's court of fifty-eight picked corporation lawyers, affecting to give all impartial forecast of the Supreme Court's coming decision, fell flat. Its grotesque pretense of lack of prejudice, by a group of attorneys who had received huge fees to take the anti-government side in various cases, were jeered from one end of the country to the other."

It is understood that Mr. Roosevelt is withholding further direct reference to the question of changing the Constitution until the Supreme Court has acted on the vital New Deal cases before it. In his budget review, issued last Monday, the statement that no new taxes seemed necessary on the basis of the present picture was predicated on the assumption, among others, that the A. A. A. processing taxes would be upheld.

Pirandello Urges Justice For Italy

Playwright And Nobel Prize Winner Issues Appeal On Eve Of Sailing

Luigi Pirandello, the Italian author, playwright and Nobel Prize winner, expressed the wish in New York City on October 5 "that a more thorough understanding of the just and historically unavoidable reasons which are determining Italy's present course will modify the present attitude of the American people."

Signor Pirandello's hint that he had found some lack of sympathy in the United States for Italy's conduct in East Africa was contained in a prepared statement issued by his secretary Saul C. Colin, just before he sailed for home on the Italian liner Conte di Savoia.

The statement read as follows:

"I am returning to Italy because I feel that in a moment as grave as the present one I cannot be away from home. I have appreciated very much the wise determination of the government of the United States to remain neutral in this Italo-Ethiopian conflict, and I wish from the bottom of my heart that a more thorough understanding of the just and historically unavoidable reasons which are determining Italy's present course will modify the present attitude of the American people.

A Matter of Life or Death

"These factors are a matter of life and death for my country and involve also the future of the civilized world as a whole. I have no doubt that once this is understood public opinion will turn in our favor.

"In taking leave of a country so wisely determined not to become entangled in a conflict, which we Italians consider a purely colonial affair and which, if we are left alone, shall remain strictly localized and shall be conducted with the fairest consideration of the interests of others, I wish to say that I hope both England and France will refrain from taking steps which may throw on them the dreadful responsibility of a European conflagration by forcing Italy, a former ally, to react accordingly.

"Indeed, it would be too horrible if for the sake of protecting abstract principles to which the United States so wisely refused to subscribe, and which were never enforced in previous conflicts, it would be too horrible, I say, if those two great nations insisted on making themselves the champions of Ethiopia against a nation whose contributions to world's advancement and civilization are so outstanding."

The playwright said that his wife and two sons, Stefano, 39 years old, a writer and Fausto, 35, a painter, are now in Rome and that both his sons may be called for service. Stefano is a reserve captain in the Italian army and Fausto is a reservist in the ranks.

During his stay here, he found that New York had become "darker" and the people "more thoughtfull and mature," because of economic troubles and political uncertainties than they were when he first visited the city twelve years ago.

A strong force of city and private police were at the liner's pier at the foot of West Seventeenth Street to guard against any anti-Fascist demonstration. There were no disorders. Among the liner's 296 passengers were six Italian reservists returning to join their military classes.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Grim Kisser

Count von Wrangel entered the army of Prussia at the age of 12 in 1796 and served in it for 81 years, until his death in 1877. He became a general in 1823, and later was stationed in Berlin, where he was a popular favorite of the population for his humor and picturesqueness. It is estimated that 100,000 young men kissed the grim warrior's face, in accordance with a custom which, in his time, made this greeting obligatory upon all the graduates of the Prussian military schools.

First Large Polish Liner Hailed In Gdynia Harbor

The first large Polish transatlantic liner, the 15,000-ton motorship Pilsudski, arrived at Gdynia, young Polish port recently from Trieste, Italy, where she was built.

The ship was cheered in the harbor by the entire population of this port and by thousands of excursionists from all over the country, according to the New York Times. She was to sail Sunday, Sept. 15, on her maiden trip to New York.

On Sept. 14 hoisted, President Moscicki, the flag on the Pilsudski, and a big naval festival was held to mark the inauguration of a regular Gdynia-New York transatlantic line, served by Polish ships, including the first big liner built for Poland.

Italian War Uniforms Criticized By Expert

Field Marshal Sir William Birdwood, a foremost British authority on warfare in tropical countries, said at a meeting of veterans at Wisbech, England that Premier Benito Muossolini had miscalculated the requirements of his troops for an Ethiopian campaign.

"A few weeks ago I saw six Italian troopships in the Suez Canal" Sir William declared. "I was struck by the extraordinary youthfulness of the troops, all boys of 18 or 19 years and unsuitably clad in great thick woollen coats. I understand that the Italian Government has now sent to India to buy khaki shirts, but it did look as if the government had not fully considered the details of what was needed for an Ethiopian campaign."

Peace Note

It was right after the armistice. An inspection was in progress.

"Look at your feet, Private Jones!" stormed the young officer. "Don't you know they should be at an angle of 45 degrees when standing at attention? For all the good it's done you there might as well have been no war at all!"—American Legion Monthly.

Italian Airmen's Plans In Africa Felt Premature

Rome Expects To Use 300 'Giant Bombers' Having 225 MPH Speed

While no one doubts that aviation would be of great importance and perhaps indispensable in the campaign which appears to be just ahead, and while it is probable that without the help of its splendid air force the Italians would never conquer Ethiopia, the announced plans of Italy's eagles are regarded as somewhat premature in some quarteis.

Italy, according to dispatches from Rome, expects to use 300 "giant bombers," new, fast machines of the Savoia-Marchetti type powered with Isotta-Fraschini engines carrying a 2,240-pound bomb load, with a cruising radius of a thousand miles and a cruising speed of 225 miles an hour, according to Lauren D. Lyman in the New York Times. This latter figure is doubted in this country, just as the claim of 175 miles an hour for the huge flying boats of Balbo's fleet was never demonstrated to the satisfaction of observers in the United States

The article continues:

Conflicting Reports

Although it is claimed that 300 big bombers are ready to "blast a way through," reports from Africa indicate that the equipment actually in use there is limited to slower and lighter Bredas and Caproni, planes much better adapted to bush warfare than the ponderous and expensive "S 88s," as the newest Savoias are called.

"War with Ethiopia would be just like slapping down a little boy," boasted one of the Italian fliers. Landing fields have been provided with machine shops and gasoline dumps, while hundreds of photographic air maps have been made by planes apparently already flying over this air-defenseless country on observation missions.

They plan to use small bombs, both incendiary and shrapnel, and they have little to say about gas. Thus equipped, they expect to conquer a country without landing fields save at Addis Ababa, without roads for their supporting troops or supplies. It is probable that no gas would be used, simply because it is likely that gas bombs would accomplish nothing. Gas, to be effective, must be used where there are thickly populated areas or areas fairly level through which great masses of troops must move. Gas for war purposes must be heavier than air and in a hilly country the defenders have merely to climb a few feet up a hillside to get entirely away from it. Gas was not used by the French in the Riff because the French knew it would not help in the conquest of the Riffians.

Coordination Needed

In his recent report to the Secretary of War, General Douglas MacArthur defined the duties of the airplane in war and put his finger on what appears the weakest feature of the Italian plan of campaign in the mountains of Ethiopia.

"The airplane, the physical embodiment of the spirit of speed, has become an indispensable member of the military team," writes General MacArthur. "The rest of the army must develop itself so as to work efficiently with this new and speedy member. This generalization assumes definite meaning when it is understood to imply a necessity on the part of the army to strive for a mobility permitting it to take advantage of the military opportunities created by an air force exploiting its own cooperative powers to the full rather than compelling the air force to waste itself away in hovering around an inert and cumbersome ground contingent as a mere protective and locally assisting agency."

Attack Limited

Later in the report General MacArthur returned again to the subject of an air attacking force working with or without the cooperation of ground troops.

"The blows that can be delivered by a strong air unit are sudden and, depending upon the vulnerability of the target, peculiarly devastating." And a sentence further along: "Unless other elements of the attacking army can take advantage of the opportunities created by the air force, the damage caused by it is likely to be promptly repaired and important tactical opportunities will be lost. On the other hand, if the commander has available special units which can speedily support air operations and sustain the opportunities created by it until additional forces can come into action, the operation may well lead to decisive results." And finally the general says:

"This vitally important sustaining role must be played by an efficient mechanized force—and other elements of the army must, in turn, arrive at the scene of action with a minimum of delay."

A veteran of the very limited air action against Sandino states that the efficiency of Italian air attacks against the Ethiopians would be utterly destroyed unless supporting ground troops could hold every objective taken by the air attackers.

"We learned in Nicaragua, and Sandino soon learned, that the airplane didn't amount to much unless ground raiding parties took over instantly. The airplane can attack, but it cannot hold. It took two years with aviation cooperation to corner Sandino, and at the most he had a force of 2,000 and we had only a few square miles to cover. The Italians have a country to conquer 600 by 700 miles, many hundreds of times as large as we had in Nicaragua, and no roads, nor even bullock-cart tracks.

"The bush fighters can scatter before an air attack does much damage, only to muster in strength again as soon as the attack has passed."

When ground raiding parties joined in Nicaragua with the airplanes and joined effectively, Sandino was quickly cornered. Observers here believe that in Ethiopia, Italy's heavy planes would be used to ferry raiding parties to the areas activity and there land them, supplying them with munitions and food by air and widening their spheres of influence by scouting and bombing the enemy located near these various bases.

For actual warfare they would use twenty or thirty pound fragmentation bombs and small torpedo planes like our own Vought Corsairs equipped with radio for keeping in touch with ground parties and carrying machine guns to use to "find" the enemy, while withholding the bombs for actual attack.

With the period of ground movement limited to a few months between the rainy seasons, airmen here believe that the conquest of Ethiopia might take years. However, the airplane offers something that can be used during the rains, since the sun is likely to shine for a little while almost every day.

"The Italians must establish bases, place efficient mobile bushfighting forces in many spots and leave them there through the rains, supplying them with food, munitions and medical supplies from the air," says one ex-marine. "They can have their block houses, which the Ethiopians cannot take with their weapons, and from each one of these centers the Italians can widen the territory under their control until the Ethiopians either capitulate as a nation or piecemeal through the defeat of separate chieftains."

The airplane, those who should know agree, may prove to be a most important agent in the subjugation of the ancient empire of the Ethiopians, but the airplane alone, in spite of the fact that it is to have no air enemy save weather, can never conquer this wild and undeveloped land.

London U. Starts Journalism School

Experiment Based On Belief Higher Quality Newspaper Work Is In Demand

"Practical Journalism" is to be taught at London University.

London University has, of course, awarded a Journalism Diploma for several years, but this session the School of Journalism at King's College begins a new experiment, says the Observer, London.

The experiment is based on the belief that the rush of modern newspaper production makes it difficult for any but a select few to gain some training in the fundamentals of journalism. It is often said that the essential elementary rules of journalism cannot be taught outside a newspaper office. Mr. Tom Clarke, Director of the new course of Practical Journalism at King's College, believes that they can.

"There is," he said recently, an increasing demand for newspaper work of a higher quality. The papers want it because the public want it. That is why London University has brought its curriculum for the journalism diploma abreast of modern newspaper requirements.

"Education for journalism is surely an essential public service in which there should be close and effective cooperation between the newspapers and the universities. Journalism is a growing profession. In spite of temporary setbacks in other countries, I believe it is going to augment its importance as an essential factor in social life—in international as well as in domestic affairs.

Journalists' Needs

"What does the journalist need? ... inner of the future need?

"First, a sound liberal education. Whatever reorganization of the present academic standard, which aims at the minimum intellectual training calculated to promote professional efficiency—English composition, the principles of criticism, the social and economic structure of today, modern history and modern English literature.

"Secondly—enough grounding in the elementary practice of journalism to fit him for the earlier stages of work in a newspaper office. That is my job. My aim will be to make this a newspaper man's school of journalism, not a place for playing at it.

"There is little of theory in my plan. I hope to be able to tell my students not only how to get news, but to make them get it. There is no dearth of writers. There is a dearth of people understanding the complicated processes of news gathering and presentation.

"We shall try to get the real atmosphere of a newspaper office. Students, and particularly the more advanced students in the two-year course, will consider themselves on a job of competitive work for a daily paper that is going to press in the next few hours.

To Learn by Doing

"The chief work will be reporting—the basis of all journalism, even in its higher and more specialised departments. The students must learn by doing. They must be real reporters. I don't want any others. I want them to get newspaper 'character.'

"Although I hope to make students do things rather than merely talk about them, there must, of course, be some instructional lectures and demonstrations. The 'case-method' may be useful—the instructor drawing on his practical experience, and then inviting discussion.

"Without the goodwill and cooperation of the Press, this newly arranged London University Journalism Course cannot achieve the success we hope for. But already there are signs of a reawakening interest in our efforts. One distinguished newspaper owner wishes to present a gold medal every year to the best all-round student. Another newspaper executive has offered the use of the editorial rooms in his office for occasional practical demonstrations. Several others are supporting the course with endowments, and experienced practical newspaper men have offered to assist at demonstrations.

Mile-Long Letter

In 1913, George D. Clardy was doing a novelty act in vaudeville which required a 36-inch roll of newspaper stock. A roll he purchased for the purpose was too wide, necessitating the sawing off of a 4-inch end. On this huge reel of paper Clardy wrote a letter using large lumber crayons, writing and rerolling until finished. The letter was then crated and shipped to Ed P Quinn in Panama. Mr. Quinn waited until he had a day off, then unrolled it along the ties of the Panama Railroad to read the letter, which reached from Empire to Culebra.

The Old Student

87-year-old Martin Link, of Buffalo, walks 8 miles every day to attend classes in horseshoe pitching at one of New York State's educational centers. He likes it so much that, rain or shine, he never fails to answer "Here." He recently won a tournament restricted to entries more than 60 years of age.

Those of us who have never visited Japan have been greatly impressed by the genius of the Japanese people as demonstrated by the activity and achievement, artistic, social and material, apparent on all sides.

"We all sincerely trust that it will be our good fortune to revisit this country with time for leisurely contact with the Japanese people.

Carter Appeals As 'Dreyfus' Victim

Former U.S. Army Engineer, Convicted Of Fraud In 1898, Charges Political Plot

Political ghosts of the "mauve decade" walked once more on Oct. 10 as 79-year-old Oberlin M. Carter seized the first opportunity given him in thirty-seven years to present officially his charge that he was railroaded out of a promising army career by a corrupt court-martial.

Before Senator Duffy of Wisconsin, chairman of a subcommittee of the Senate's Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. Carter, a former captain of engineers, related an American version of what he called a "Dreyfus case," seeking vindication of his soldier's honor.

He charged that his military conviction of illegally sharing in the construction funds for improving the harbor at Savannah in 1898 was engineered by powerful politicians of the time, according to the New York Times.

He intimated that the old "Ohio gang" led by the late Mark Hanna overcame President McKinley's reluctance to approve the court-martial findings by asserting to him:

"If you don't drop Carter you lose Ohio and Admiral Dewey will be the next President."

Since 1898 Mr. Carter has sought a review of his court-martial. The Senate group was instructed to hear his story by virtue of a resolution introduced last session by Senator Lewis of Illinois.

Mr. Carter, who began a promising army career after graduating, he said, with the second highest average of any cadet in West Point's history —Robert E. Lee had the highest— presented his own defense and called several witnesses to testify as to his good reputation.

The Savannah harbor scandal involved an alleged "graft" to contractors and others of almost $500,000 and caused newspapers of the day to urge President McKinley to punish serverly all involved.

Mr. Carter attributed the animus of some political leaders to him in the Savannah case to the fact that he had, as a member of the American Canal Commission, favored the Panama rather than the Nicaragua route which was urged by the Maritime Canal Company of New York. That company was headed by Warner Miller, then a Senator.

Senators Minton of Indiana and Austin of Vermont, members of the subcommittee, were not present for the session.

Senator Duffy told Mr. Carter that he could be here only today, as he planned leaving soon on a trip to Manila, and asked the former army captain to speed up his testimony.

Mr. Carter said that the luxurious mode of life he was able to maintain in Savannah because he had married a daughter of the late Robert F. Westcott of New York, who had been an associate of the early Vanderbilts, had aroused the jealousy of his successor there and resulted in the original investigation.

Carter has been a consulting engineer here since his release from Fort Leavenworth, where he served a sentence of five years.

The bonds confiscated by the government as alleged money he received from the harbor contractors, Mr. Carter said, were left in his possession by his father-in-law.

He told the Senator he had tried for years to get a hearing "before all the witnesses died, as they now have."

Mr. Duffy indicated he would consult with Senators Minton and Austin before making a recommendation.

US Labor Pledged To Neutral Stand

Green Says Federation Will Insist America Avoid Any Ethiopian Entanglement

Organized labor will insist that the Government of the United States maintain strict neutrality in the event of war in Europe, it was announced at Atlantic City recently by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, says the New York Times.

The burden of Mr. Green's message on foreign affairs was delivered by him in almost identical language on three separate occasions when addressing conventions of the metal trades, building trades and union label trades departments of the A. F. of L.

Except for the union label department, a large part of the business of the other groups consisted of heated discussions of the craft versus industrial union issue and the rivalry among the two building trades groups, each claiming to be the "legitimate" building department affiliated with the federation

Group Urged to Secede

So bitter was the discussion that one building group was urged to secede from the federation if its status was not recognized, while the chief of a metal union threatened to "become a rebel" if the federation convention next week took a stand on the industrial union issue, which he felt would jeopardize the life of his union.

Further dissatisfaction with Mr. Green's stand on the interunion building trade dispute was evoked among one building union group by his refusal to address the building department of which W. J. McDonough is president, although he had made an address to the rival group led by J. W. Williams.

Instead of deciding on the question of seceding from the federation at this time, the McDonough group recessed subject to call and to await the action of the credentials committee of the A. F. of L. convention as to whether it would approve Mr. McDonough's credentials as delegate from the building trades department. It is a foregone conclusion that Mr. McDonough will not be permitted to take his seat next week as a representative of his department, as Mr. Green today notified the McDonough group that he and the executive council recognized the Williams group as the "legitimate" building trades department.

Fears Conflict May Spread

In discussing the events in Ethiopia Mr. Green said the world was shocked by what happened in Africa yesterday. He was apprehensive lest the Italo-Ethiopian conflict be the "beginning of a greater conflict."

"In spite of our efforts we were dragged into the last world war," he declared. "But under no circumstances must those in charge of our government be involved in this conflict. Labor will insist that strict neutrality shall be the American policy, while we should make every effort to find a peaceful solution, to use our good offices to mediate, if possible."

At the McDonough building union meeting a resolution was adopted "condemning" Mr. Green for having called a convention in which he installed the Williams group. The latter unions also were criticized for resorting to court action against the McDonough unions.

Frank Feeney, president of the latter unions also were criticized for resorting to court action in the fight Elevator Constructors Union, at this meeting proposed that his group surrender its charter to the federation if the latter persisted in recognizing the Williams group and that a new organization be formed. Although he was ruled out of order, his suggestion was espoused by J. J. Hynes of the Sheet Metal Workers, who favored seceding from the federation in a body if their group were not recognized by the A. F. of L. He demanded an end to "fooling around" and urged that an "ultimatum" be served on the federation.

50th Anniversary Of Liszt's Death Is Noted

kindly remark—"I have made more and bigger mistakes in life than that!"

On Liszt's visits to Budapest he was the guest of Canon Schwendtner, and often conducted the music in the Delvarosi Church, which lies below the level of the Elisabeth Bridge on the Pest side of the Danube. One Sunday Liszt was so transported by the music of the "Gloria" that his baton remained poised in mid-air for some seconds. Before the pause could be noticed by the congregation Mr. Engeszer, the conductor, jumped forward, and, taking the baton from Liszt's hand, carried the "Gloria" to a finish.

This incident was repeated on subsequent occasions, but Mr. Engeszer never failed to jump forward and carry on the service when the master forgot his whereabouts in a musical reverie.

His Kindness

A little story of Liszt's kindness to amateurs has for hero the young composer of an exceedingly mediocre piece of music. Unable to prophesy a future for the novice, Liszt passed his composition to a musician who eventually lost it.

The young man seemed so depressed by the loss of his composition that Liszt invited him to call again next day, and then sat down to rewrite the whole piece of music from memory.

With regard to the German campaign to refute Liszt's Hungarian origin, Margit Jako, the pianist, relates a story of 1850, when Liszt was asked to play at a concert in the Burg of Vienna.

Concert Comedy

Count Sedlnitzky, the Austrian chief of police, was doubtful of the advisability of having a Magyar performer at a court concert only two years after the Hungarian rising; but he received conclusive proofs of Liszt's reliability.

He was, therefore, more than taken aback when Liszt opened with one of his Hungarian rhapsodies, and ended with the "Rakoczi March," which meant eight weeks' imprisonment for those who played it in pubic. Cries of "Lese Majeste" and "treachery" were heard.

Seeing that all was now lost, the unhappy Seldnitzky sat as though turned to stone. The Emperor, however, rose and shook Liszt's hand warmly, expressing appreciation of his wonderful playing.

"Please play that beautiful Hungarian march once again," the Emperor commanded. "I rarely have the opportunity of hearing it!"

Ethiopian Ruler Governs Nation In Role Of Despot

man.

The Emperor works through ministers and provincial governors, all of whom are responsible exclusively to him. Some are chosen because of their ability and attachment to him, others because they are—ward politicians. He wisely mixes the old with the new.

Of Haile Selasse's 11 ministers about half are of humble origin, one being a former mailman. They have no independent power and do little more than give advice and carry out the Emperor's orders.

Parliament, according to the Constitution, consists of 800 deputies, chosen by the governors of the 14 divisions of the land and of 80 senators appointed by the Emperor from among the governors and nobles. However, this is theory only, as the Constitution itself is theory. In reality, there are 28 deputies and 28 senators, who meet once a week for three months and then make way for another shift. It's only a legislative school. People come in from the provinces to get a look at the State machine and practice at law-making. They listen to speeches, applaud and give mild advice. When they have something vital to say they mount their mules and go straight to the palace.

Governors Get No Pay

There are not less than 30 provinces, governed in a rather dictatorial manner by appointees of the emperor. Many of the governors are so far from Addis Ababa that they can do almost as they please, so there is a misuse of authority and funds all along the line. The common people are usually so heavily and capriciously taxed that they produce nothing more than what is necessary for life. If they laid by anything it would only attract the attention of the rapacious soldiers of unscrupulous chiefs. The governors get no pay and so have to live off their provinces.

The functions of the Ethiopian state are reduced to a minimum. Outside of collecting taxes, it interferes in the life of the people as little as possible. There are few schools, only the simplest courts and no public utilities. Every man is his own policeman and jailer. There is a very small central army, no network of private telephones, very few telegraph lines and but one railroad line. The Radio Telegraph works well and there is a limited postal service.

Commerce exists in spite of the Government, industry consists of domestic weaving, spinning and basket making, and the agriculturist while scratching his land with a wooden plow, constantly prays that the Government may leave him in peace. Every group and family relies upon itself and asks little from the state.

That people impose order on their own authority and when disputing ask any venerable passer-by to be a judge. They even dispense with state interference in most of their weddings. They get along quite well and are surprisingly happy.

The only loyalty they feel to the state is their willingness to follow the Emperor in defense of their land. In this respect they are rabid patriots.

This picture of the Ethiopian state is dark, brightened only by three rays of light; one is the Emperor, who is an excellent statesman; the second is the remarkable innate ability of the people to preserve order and secure fairness; the third is a decided tendency toward progress. Ethiopia is capable of rapid advancement.

Wanted a Rest

A little four-year-old had been taken for a country walk. It was a warm day, and after a time the father lifted him and carried him pick-a-back for several miles.

Tiring himself, the parent was searching for an excuse to put down his load when a small voice piped, "Daddy, may I get down and have a rest?"—Montreal Star.

Natural Science Declares War On Aerial Bombing

the information given and the corrective measures suggested are the most modern available.

People Must Be Prepared

It is felt that, although the statement of the natural scientists is correct in saying that the only absolutely safe measures wouild be too expensive, the civilian population must be ready to do their best to defend themselves.

Meanwhile civilian forces in Britain are also urging public opinion to fight against the possibilities or gas attacks from the air.

The Peace Committee of the Society of Friends is issuing booklets which take the line that to prepare for war is to ask for war, and that the energies of all should be devoted to preparing for peace.

"Either we stand for a policy of friendship, understanding, mutual aid, freedom and a consideration for all men," one statement declares, "or we surrender to our fears, and take the way of gas masks and preventive drill and running for gasproof and bombproof shelters, and the heathen satisfaction of reciprocal massacre and revenge. It seems curious that Christians should hesitate at all before such an alternative."

Repersentative knit goods being shipped to the United States.

Quality Knit Goods ow Produced in Jarap

By TAICHIRO MIYAZAKI

apan's knit goods manufacture has recently advanced to a point where quality knit goods are being produced on a large scale. Some of them are even superior in quality to those of foreign manufacture.

Some time ago I was surprised by a visit of a certain foreigner. Showing me a pair of a golf hose, he advised me to start its manufacturing because of the rapid advance of Japan's knit goods production and her cheap labor cost.

Having taken a glance at the article shown, I noticed that the design was the kind that was popular among foreigners. Upon closer investigation, however, I discovered that it had been made in Japan, and told him so. I then brought him to my own works where all the modern equipment were submitted to his personal inspection. While inspecting some of our sample materials, he found one similar to the article he brought in. And then he was convinced. The very golf hose he showed me was one of those bought and exported from Yokohama to America last year.

This is merely one of many examples happening daily in Japan's knit goods manufacturing world. I am of a strong opinion that Japan's knit goods will soon be shipped abroad in large amount. (Adv.)

Hoover Strategy For Nomination Devised

delegates will be hand-picked pro-Hoover men and will be committed on the early ballots to former Governor Cooper, but ready to swing to Hoover if the favorable moment should arrive.

In the event of a convention deadlock, the plan is said to call for these Ohio delegates voting for Mr. Hoover in the hope of starting a boom which might win the nomination for him. Mr. Hoover will not enter the primaries, however.

Mr. Hoover has held that his defeat in 1932 was not due to his policies or his personality but to a set of circumstances for which he was not responsible, and now he is represented as desiring vindication at the polls of the nation.

Uncertainty Regarding Borah

The silence of Senator Borah as to his entrance into the Presidential contest thus been a factor that is embarrassing not only to Mr. Hoover, but also to the few men who are openly seeking the nomination.

While Mr. Hoover was conferring in an upper apartment of the Waldorf-Astoria in New York this past week word came from Boise that Mr. Borah would remain a "potential candidate" as long as Mr. Hoover figured in that capacity. The Western politician who brought this message explained that this did not mean that Mr. Borah would not finally submit his name to the primaries.

Since returning to Idaho, Mr. Borah is reported to have satisfied himself that he would be re-elected to the Senate despite the assertion of Chairman Farley that the Democrats were confident of retiring him next year.

If sentiment for him should rise and continue to develop until early next year, Senator Borah would go into the primaries in Illinois, the Dakotas, Nebraska and other States where he has received encouragement from Progressive and Old Guard leaders, his followeres told New York leaders.

In what is regarded as an effort to strengthen his position, Mr. Borah is now working in cooperation with other Senators on a farm relief bill designed to supplant the AAA if the latter is voided by the Supreme Court.

If a bill can be devised during the next few months that meets with the approval of farm leaders Senator Borah will sponsor it.

Discussing recent developments Charles Michelson, director of publicity for the Democratic National Committee, said today in a press statement that Mr. Hoover's Oakland speech last week was a bid for the nomination directed toward big business and the supporters of the Liberty League.

Robinson Disputes Hoover On Facts

Senator Accuses Ex-President Of 'Misstatements And Distortions' In Speech

Commenting upon former President Hoover's speech on October 5, Senator Robinson, majority leader of the Senate, on October 7 in Washington, D. C., characterized the utterances as those of a man who "was seeking return to power," and added:

"It might, however, be expected that a former President of the United States would have abstained from the misstatements and distortions of the ordinary campaign propagandist."

Asserting, according to the New York Times, that Mr. Hoover's thesis was that the policies of the administration had done nothing toward alleviating the depression and that improvement did not come until after the Supreme Court had declared the NRA unconstitutional, Senator Robinson had this to say in reply:

"Digging into the newspapers of that approximate date, we discover that industrial production in the United States was higher during the first quarter of 1935 than in any like period since 1930.

Business and Industry Reports

"This is the report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, which goes on to say that 'automobile and glass manufacturing led the long list of constantly improving industries, forecasts from the executives of all which, according to Dun and Bradstreet, are optimistic of the future.'

"Secretary of Labor Perkins announced gains of $5,400,000 in weekly payrolls during March of this year. The life insurance salesmen's bureau reported a gain of 14 per cent in sales of life insurance. The National Retail Credit Association reported an average increase of 5.1 per cent in collections and 3.9 per cent in credit sales.

"These few instances would seem to indicate that there was some industrial progress before the Supreme Court knocked out the NRA.

"The ex-President paraded a mass of alleged statistics in regard to the national debt and the deficit. The figures he produced indicate bookkeeping errors ranging from $5,000,000,000, to $9,000,000,000 in the discussion of the fiscal affairs of the government.

Figures on National Debt

"Mr. Hoover places the national debt at $34,000,000,000. On Sept. 30 the actual figure was $29,421,331,670,22. Of this amount, the government had a proprietary interest—in other words, recoverable assets, in corporations financed wholly or in part by the government—of $4,527,106,842. The value of these assets would reduce the national debt at the present time to below $25,000,000,000.

"Mr. Hoover also used $8,000,000,000 as the basis for his discussion of the increase in the annual expenditures. The budget estimate for the fiscal year 1935-36 shows that the total expenditures will be $7,752,000,000. Revenue will amount to $4,470,000,000, and the total increase in the deficit will be only $3,281,000,000.

"In fact, the administration's figures show that on June 30, 1936, the total national debt will be approximately $30,724,000,000, far below the figure which Mr. Hoover uses as the current one.

"This $30,724,000,000 is without reference to the recoverable assets; that is, the money loaned by the government for which it has adequate security and which is being constantly and continuously repaid. If these assets are placed on the balance sheet, it will be seen that Mr. Hoover's figure for the national debt is $9,000,000,000 too high.

"Moreover, Mr. Hoover's figures take no account of an available cash balance in the Treasury of $1,798,000000.

"He very solemnly cautions the people not to be led astray by slogans. Perhaps he is speaking from a sorry memory of certain slogans which were loudly sounded during his previous campaigns, such as the 'chicken-in-every pot' slogan of 1928 and the famous one in his unsuccessful campaign for re-election, about the grass-grown streets which were bound to appear in the event of his defeat.

"Finally he suggested that the inevitable result of the Roosevelt administration if it perseveres is that we shall see 'one of these three horsemen ravage the land—taxation, or repudiation, or inflation.'

"It seems to me that the general opinion of the country is that if Mr. Hoover had been re-elected and his drifting, do-nothing policy had persevered, the horsemen we in this country would have had to face would have been wholesale starvation, complete bankruptcy, or revolution.

"Like every other Republican speaker of the present era, while deploring the relief expenditures, he gives no hint of any project, plan, or even an idea of a substitute program to keep the unemployed from hunger and hardship until such time as industry can and will put them back to work."

Rockefeller Tries Hand At Interview

'Inaccessible' Himself, He Aids Reporters In Questioning New Director

John D. Rockefeller Jr., listed among the inaccessibles by experts in the art of interviewing, turned interviewer himself recently according to the New York Times.

He lent his aid to reporters seeking an answer to the question whether the coming of a new director to the world-famed Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, to succeed Dr. Simon Flexner, meant a change in policy for the institute.

"That is a fair question," said Mr. Rockefeller, coming to the aid of reporters interviewing the new director, Dr. Herbert Spencer Gasser, 47-year-old native of Platteville, Wis., and former director of the Physiological Laboratories of the Cornell University Medical College.

Dr. Gasser said that no change in policy was implied in the mere fact that he, a physiologilst, was succeeding Dr. Flexner, whose fame rests in a large measure upon his work in the field of pathology.

"I am wondering," pursued Mr. Rockefeller, "why we started with an expert in pathology, and now we have one in physiology."

"It is because we have to give more attention to the function of the body," answered Dr. Gasser. "It is also because in the last fifty years in the field of the conquest of infectious diseases we have been very successful."

First Day in Post

The circumstances that produced the new and unexpected role of interviewer for Mr. Rockefeller were incidental to the ceremonies formally introducing Dr. Gasser to his new post.

Once in the course of the interview, which took place in the board room in the graying stone pile at Sixty-sixth Street and York Avenue, overlooking the East River, Mr. Rockefeller was temporarily stopped by the stock interview answer, from Dr. Gasser, "I always feel that it is dangerous to predict."

This was the reply that Mr. Rockefeller received to his question, "Perhaps we could say that there is a more fruitful promise of reward in the field of physiology today than there is in the field of pathology?"

Mr. Rockefeller covered his reporters that "one of the principal supports of strength of the institute has always been that it works in all fields."

Dr. Gasser then continued his defense of the importance of physiology, saying:

"In the last fifty years the conquest of infectious diseases has been very successful. When one looks at the diseases that are decreasing and those that are increasing, one finds that those that are lethal because of deterioration of organs are increasing. Cancer, for example, is going up."

A Medical Alternative

"But isn't it true, Dr. Gasser," asked Mr. Rockefeller, "that increase is a rate based upon, shall we say, increase in population—I am now referring to cancer—and increase in longevity?"

"But that increase," Dr. Gasser replied, "is due in a large measure to the great strides that have been made in pathology, which is represented in the greater preservation of life."

"Then it really depends," countered Mr. Rockefeller, "which you prefer—to die early or live for cancer. What do you prefer?"

The last question Dr. Gasser took as purely academic and answered with a short laugh.

The group of newspaper men invited to meet the new head of the institute were seemingly making no headway in their efforts to discover the news in Dr. Gasser's succession to the post from which Dr. Flexner resigned early last Summer, when Mr. Rockefeller decided to take a hand in the interviewing himself.

He began by granting that "it was hardly possible for a man coming on his first day to a new task to predict that he would make any changes in the institute," but urged an answer to the question.

"I should think that the question might be put this way," Mr. Rockefeller said (turning to the newspaper men present, "I don't mean to presume to usurp your role"). "But, Dr. Gasser, isn't it true that it is hardly possible for a man coming on his first day to a new task to make any change or suggesting changes?"

"That is true," said Dr. Gasser. "There can be no change for some time to come, and such changes as I may decide may be of benefit will be made first in the form of suggestion to the board of directors."

Patin

Guy Patin, famous French physician and writer, (1602-1672) was for many years Professor of Medicine at the College of France. He was a bitter enemy of modern medicine, and a disbeliever in quinine, antimony and the circulation of blood. Through inculcating this disbelief into a generation of medical students, he surely retarded the progress of the medical profession by at least a century. But Patin was also a man of prodigious memory. He imported and destroyed a library of 10,000 volumes, each of which was prohibited by the French Government. Lest he be caught violating the King's prohibition, he memorized the contents of each volume before he committed it to the flames. The contents of the forbidden books were repeated by him at gatherings and private assemblies, in which his participation was eagerly sought.

Mrs. Art Jarrett Sounds Blue Note Over '36 Prospects

Christian Science Monitor

KANSAS CITY, Oct. 11.—Eleanor Holm, pretty backstroke champion of the United States women's Olympic team, sounded a blue note today over the 1936 prospects—as blue as those she puts into song with her husband's dance orchestra.

"Look out for Holland, warned the trim, brunette wife of Art Jarrett.

"They have in a broad-shouldered girl, Willimintje Den Ouden, a possible winner of three events, quite enough to take the Olympic title away from our team at Berlin if the other places are evenly distributed.

"Right now I would say the American team can be sure of only one event, the 100-meter backstroke."

Miss Holm holds the record of 1m. 18.3s., for that and she intends to defend it at Berlin, become the first United States girl to compete in three Olympics and then step out of the amateur class—probably into a moving picture career.

"I haven't been doing much swimming since April," she said. "There's too much danger of going stale. I can get in trim in a few weeks. I'll go down to Florida in December and engage in competition there before entering the Olympic tryouts next June."

The Holland girl, 14 at the time of the 1932 Olympics at Los Angeles, finished only one second behind Helene E. Madison, of the United States, in the 100-meter freestyle event and Miss Madison had to set a new record to beat her.

Soviet Workers Flee High Cost Of City Living

Planners Face Real Problem Since Abolition Of Bread Cards

The Soviet state, the only "capitalist" in Russia, is faced with the necessity of increasing real wages for its city industrial workers in order to prevent a wholesale exodus to collective farms and small towns. A serious labor shortage in city industries has developed since abolition of bread cards last January, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

A complicated problem confronts Russia's "state-planners." They must finance the huge capital investments in state industry stipulated by the second Five-Year Plan, be tripled cost of the enlarged Red Army and military industry, and at the same time must make sufficient concessions to peasants and urban workers alike to encourage maximum production.

The first Five-Year Plan was financed largely by "exploiting" peasants, with the result that agricultural production fell so low that concessions were necessary. When concessions were made, production rose rapidly again.

The peasants are now working so well that the Kremlin has no desire to discourage them again.

Back to Farm

But money had to be found somewhere to maintain the scale of capital investment in state and military industry. It is now apparent that abolition of bread cards was a disguised effort to make urban workers take a cut in real wages. What has been the result? A "back-to-the-farm" movement of large dimensions has developed. Large industrial centers have lost so many workers that production has fallen sharply.

An exhaustive survey was made at Chelyabinsk, a typical new industrial center. The survey showed that Chelyabinsk industries had 2000 fewer workers in April than in March, although the "Plan" called for an increase of 8000 workers.

Investigators analyzed the labor turnover, which they found was not casual but chronic. Recent changes in the wage-price system, they discovered, had made life so much more agreeable in agricultural villages and small towns that workers were permanently deserting large industrial centers.

Married Workers Go

Taking 486 workers at random, the investigators learned that 180 of these had gone back to state and collective farms, 22 had gone to the army and schools, and 83 had gone to small towns, where wages are somewhat lower but food costs are about half those in industrial centers. Only 201 of the 486 remained in Chelyabinsk.

Married workers especially are leaving cities, as increased food costs affect them most. Industries found recruits only in districts where crops were bad, and half of these were women. Many admitted that they intended to stay only long enough to accumulate a little cash.

While many of those who left Chelyabinsk were unskilled, others were highly skilled and had worked in factories and mines for years. They found work in small-town industries or in machine-tractor stations as mechanics and drivers. They said: "We live better and get better food in small places."

Investigations disclosed that many married women were leaving industry, to make better homes for husbands and children. They do not like to eat in community dining rooms—the Soviet term for restaurants. They said their families were more content when they stayed at home, did housework, and raised vegetables in little gardens.

Higher Wages Will Do It

The investigators summarized their findings. The present trend, they said, will probably make small towns and villages more attractive than most cities, especially for unskilled peasant labor. The state, as Russia's sole "capitalist," can lure workers to large industrial centers only by offering them substantially higher wages.

This realistic analysis probably is unpalatable to the Kremlin, which has tried one device after another since 1928 to persuade peasants and industrial workers to get along with a minimum living standard so that the state can reinvest its profits in industry. It has been proved time and again that larger inducements are necessary to assure maximum production in agriculture or industry.

Apparently, the "state planners" have only two alternatives: to reduce capital investments or to introduce some new type of "forced labor" to compel workers to remain in large industries. But it has been proved in the past that compulsion is risky, making workers discontented and thus lowering productivity.

The more probable course is curtailment of the second Five-Year Plan to permit an increase in real wages for city industrial workers.

Gugsa, In New Uniform, Yearns To See High Life

General Gugsa, of Ethiopia who went over to the Italian side with 6,500 men, is becoming accustomed to his new surroundings. He wears a brilliant European general's uniform which Italian officers have not yet told him to discard.

He eats spaghetti with the officers and expresses the hope of seeing one big battle where he can distinguish himself, says a recent report from Adigrat to the New York Times. Then, he says, he wants to go to Rome and see some "high life."

His troops, which arrived armed with modern Japanese rifles, will be incorporated with Italian forces. The first 1,500 men who accompanied their leader were assigned to the Sila Division.

Paris Extending Anti-Noise Drive To Daytime Blare

Police Carry Long List Of Forbidden Inroads On City's Quiet

Resolved to rid itself of the reputation of being the world's noisiest city, Paris is intensifying its anti-noise campaign. Instructions have just been issued which, if strictly enforced, will transform the French capital into a city of comparative silence, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Completing measures already in effect for several weeks, thanks to which no honking may be heard between 9 at night and 8 in the morning, steps have now been taken to lessen daytime noises as well. Screeching brakes, popping motorcycles, roaring exhausts, raucous klaxons, rattling ashcans, rumbling trucks, banging engines, whistling jigs, ranting radios—these are a few of the noisemakers which have now been banned, or subjected to strict regulation.

A circular has been distributed to all police officials by the Paris authorities calling on them to apply and enforce these silence measures, and laying down the rule that "repression of noise, night and day, has become an important part of the duties of the guardians of the peace."

Always the Other Fellow

Recalling the ruling passed in 1931 that "all unnecessary noises, or sounds due to a lack of precaution, which are of such a nature as to disturb the rest and calm of the populace, are forbidden," the circular points out that anyone making such noises is punishable by a fine of 11 to 15 francs (70 cents to a dollar).

With the single exception of the nocturnal suppression of automobile horns and klaxons, however, this decree has until now remained a dead letter. Noise was a habit, in Paris, and one not easy to correct. Each individual had a typical tendency, to consider his own noises as necessary, while only his neighbors' were "unnecessary" and "due to a lack of precaution."

To get around this difficulty, the policemen of the capital have now been furnished with lists of the offending sounds and have been instructed to exercise special diligence in silencing them. If the "flics" (French for "cops" or "Bobbies") take their instructions seriously, then a new era of quietness is in sight for Parisians.

Carpet-Beating Hours

The most significant of these instructions are those relative to the radio. Recognizing that the bellowing of inconsiderate amplifiers has become a scourge of the city, the circular prescribes that it is the duty of policemen to respond immediately to any appeals from harassed tenants whose neighbor's radio or phonograph is making itself heard all over the building—or even, as often happens, all over the neighborhood.

The thunderous rumble of heavy trucks is another source of unpleasant sound which has now been regulated. All trucks have been limited to speeds of from 12 to 25 miles per hour, and those with solid tires have been confined to even lower speed limits. In addition, solid-tired trucks have been entirely barred from certain streets at night.

Ash-cans and garbage containers, it is provided, must no longer be "dragged about and thrown down" upon the sidewalk, but must in future be "carried and carefully deposited." The same ruling also applies to the familiar clatter of milk cans.

Carpets, in accordance with an old Parisian custom, can still be beaten out of the windows of flats, but these beatings must be confined, in summer to the single hour between 7 and 8 a. m., and in winter to the two-hour period between 7 and 9. In the case of windows opening on courts, however, the beating is allowed to reverbate for three hours in the afternoon.

Starhemberg Becomes Virtual Dictator Of Austria

Socialists, Major Fey personally supervised the attack on the Karl Marx Hof, one of the big Vienna workers' apartments. The Socialists held him responsible for the outbreak of violence.

Major Fey was imprisoned in the Chancellery in July, 1934, when Dr. Dollfuss was assassinated by Nazis. To him the dying Chancellor addressed his last words.

When Dr. Schuschnigg formed his Cabinet on July 29, Major Fey received the post of Special Commissioner of Security and also was made Minister of the Interior.

When the Austrian Government Baron Odo Neustaedter-Stuermer, turned Fascist in February, 1934, a Heimwehr leader and Cabinet Under-Secretary, was raised to the rank of Minister of Social Welfare, the post he lost yesterday. In March, 1934, the Socialist trade unions were dissolved and replaced by Fascist organizations that were place under his supervision.

The Baron played a prominent part in the Nazi "putsch" in which Chancellor Dollfuss was killed. He acted as intermediator between the Nazi rebels and the Austrian Government, and arranged with the German Legation that the mutineers should have free egress from Austria into Germany. He was one of the main witnesses in the State trial against the insurgents.

Limit On Pulitzer Prizes

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, New York City, announced on October 17 that the advisory board of the School of Journalism, which recommends each year to the university candidates for the Pulitzer prizes, had voted unanimously that "no prize in journalism or letters be awarded to an individual more than once."

This does not prevent the award of more than one journalism prize to a single newspaper, it was explained, according to the New York Times. The public service prize may, in the discretion of the members of the advisory board, be awarded to the same newspaper twice.

Export Rise Taking Reich Out Of Red

September Sales Abroad Were 373,000,000 Marks, The Best Since March Of 1934

With imports throttled under the "new plan" of Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, Minister of Economics, and exports continuing to rise ever since the 1,000,000,000-mark subsidy scheme went into effect in June, Germany is successfully pulling herself out of the red ink in her foreign trade.

If she is able to continue her present course she may end the year even with a surplus in her international balance payments, which might not improve her foreign creditors' chances but would serve her in good stead in case recurrent food shortages became too acute for national discipline, says Otto D. Tolischus in the New York Times.

This trend was clearly revealed by September trade figures, published today. German imports remained at 317,900,000 marks, which is only 300,000 marks higher than in August, when they reached the lowest point for years. German exports, on the other hand, amounted to 373,000,000 marks, which is the highest figure since March, 1934.

The export surplus amounts, therefore, to 55,100,000 marks, which reduces the total deficit for the year to 30,300,000, compared with 163,900,000 for the first half of this year and 285,900,000 for 1934.

Debt Payments Still Big

Germany still pays between 300,000,000 and 400,000,000 marks yearly on her foreign debts under clearance and standstill agreements, but this amount she earns through invisible export services and capital investments, so any final surplus in her balance of trade will be a welcome emergency penny.

Further development of her trade balance, however, will depend on the amount of additional food she must import this Winter and her attitude toward sanctions against Italy.

Italy is one of Germany's best customers, being a particularly heavy buyer of German coal. During the first half of this year her combined purchases from Germany amounted to 124,200,000 marks, or 5,200,000 more than for the same period last year, and Italian purchases have been rising since. The export increase last month was due largely to additional shipments of coal and coke, and Italy is among the countries to which these exports increased.

That Germany, on the other hand, is not selling Italy much war material is indicated by the fact that exports of finished goods, especially iron products, machines, chemicals and pharmaceutical products declined.

No "Official" Warning

There are reports that German commercial and industrial organizations have warned their members against sales to Italy until the question of payment has been settled, but inquiry in official quarters merely elicited a reply that such a warning, while wholly possible, was not official.

Other countries which bought more from Germany last month were Great Britain, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Sweden, Denmark and Belgium, while the United States, Argentina, Brazil, China and the British Indies bought less.

Notable is the fact that German imports of food increased 5,000,000 marks last month, mainly at the expense of importation of raw materials. The present month is expected to show a further increase in food purchases, although to keep them down Germany is already beginning to ration certain foods.

Butter is available only in quarter-pound packages as a rule, and today the production and sale of cream—whipped cream, so dear to the German feminine heart—was reduced 40 per cent.

In return, however, steady successes are being announced in the replacement of foreign raw materials, the latest being that Germany is now able to produce all the zinc she needs.

Women Quit Federation On Birth Control Issue

Charging the General Federation of Women's Clubs with "being un-American in forcing an issue which is contrary to the dictates of the conscience of hundreds of its members," the Los Angeles Catholic Woman's Club withdrew from the Federation on October 16.

The issue, said Mrs. J. Selby Spurck, president of the Catholic club, was endorsement by the General Federation of birth control legislation, according to the New York Times.

"Since the measure is both un-American and un-Catholic, the board of directors, with fifteen members present, voted unanimously to consider ourselves automatically withdrawn from the General Federation," Mrs. Spurck said.

The club will retain its membership in the California federation and in the Los Angeles district because these two groups have not yet taken action on the birth control question.

Secret War Study Bared In Germany

Suppressed Parts Of Beck Talk Admit General Staff Was Organized In 1920

The martial "anniversary" ceremony at the German War Academy in Berlin, held on October 15, which was marked by announcement of the reconstitution of the German general staff, was also featured by an official admission that the German general staff had been in existence ever since 1920, although forbidden by the Treaty of Versailles.

The admission was made by no less a person than General Ludwig Beck, the old and new chief of the general staff, in a speech, says the New York Times. Only excerpts of the speech were originally issued to the press, but the Boersen Zeitung prints it in full today in the mood, "now it can be told."

"The reason for the downfall of freedom, for the loss of the Great War, was not military failure," said General Beck. "The old German Army returned home after the war crowned with laurels and immortality. At the rebirth of the new army, therefore, it was necessary to find contacts with those factors that had constituted the old army's mighty superiority.

"In this sense the highest leaders who survived the end of the old army went to work during the period of transition of the imposed and fettered 100,000-men army. In this sense General Hans von Seeckt, historic creator of the new Reich Army, conceived his task when on July 6, 1919, he assumed office as chief of the general staff for a short time and in that sense he continued as chief of the General Troops Office and later as chief of the Army Command.

"He not only created a model army, which the world admired and often feared, and laid with it the military foundations for the present reconstruction of the army, but from the very start he devoted his entire care to the maintenance and furtherance of the general staff and very high class military leadership.

"As early as November, 1919, he gave initiative to the training of officers in the manner of training given in the former War Academy. It was to take place at the army district commands, which were furnished with special teachers for that purpose.

"In the Summer of 1920 an examination was held for the first pupils, who were to act as assistants to the higher troop command. On Oct. 1, 1920, began training fixed at two years. On Oct. 1, 1923, a third year at the Reichswehr Ministry was added.

"From this day the training, restored to a three-year period, was continued for nine years, partly according to new ideas. From Oct. 1, 1932, courses for leadership assistants were combined in 'officers' courses in Berlin' at the former court building in Lehrter Street, because the former War Academy building had been used for other purposes after the war.

"Since May 1, 1935, these courses again have borne the name 'war academy.' With them, even in externals, the old example has been reincarnated and the new army possessed even in externals that important training ground for military leadership to which the old Germany Army owed so much."

The existence of the general staff always has been suspected and was no longer denied to foreign Military Attaches after May 1. Yesterday, however, was the first public reference to it, with the result that all German newspapers today feature the "anniversary celebration" and some introduce the chief of the general staff to the German people.

Stage Group Set Up By American Labor

Endorsed by international unions of the American Federation of Labor with a membership of 500,000, organized labor's first venture into the field of the theatre was announced in Atlantic City, N. J., on October 13 in the formation of Labor Stage, Inc., which will present plays dealing with labor's social and cultural ideals, says the New York Times.

In giving the venture his approval William Green, president of the federation, said:

"I welcome heartily this undertaking to serve the cultural needs of a vast labor audience in terms of the drama. There has long been a need for a movement in the theatre which would be the expression of labor's social aspirations and a channel of self-expression for the organized labor masses."

The new organization will encourage non-professional groups in the labor movement, will coordinate their work and will plan for the creation of facilities "to meet the needs of large-scale labor pageants, celebrations, mass gatherings, in collaboration with existing trade unions."

Plays that help clarify the aims of the trade union members in advancing on their economic and social goals will be sought by the new group, whose temporary offices will be at 3 West Sixteenth Street, New York City, pending negotiations for a theater.

Among the sponsors of the movement, according to the announcement, are: Sidney Hillman, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America; David Dubinsky, International Ladies Garment Workers Union; Francis J. Gorman, United Textile Workers; Rose Schneiderman, National Women's Trade Union League; Dr. Henry Linville, Teachers Guild; Joseph Schlossberg, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America; Max Zaritsky, Cap and Millinery Workers Union; Julius Hochman, joint board of the Dressmakers Union; Samuel Shore, White Goods Workers Union; Isador Nagler, New York Cloakmakers Union; Chester M. Wright, Eugene Lyons, Arturo Giovannitti, Max Danish, Frank Crosswaithe, Morris Feinstone, Fred Umhey, Mark Starr and Louis Schaffer.

Joan Crawford Married To Tone

Film Stars Wedded By Mayor Of Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey

Mayor Herbert W. Jenkins of Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, announced on Oct. 13 that he had married Joan Crawford, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer screen star, and Franchot Tone, a featured player of the same studio, at 10 A. M. October 11.

Miss Crawford was married under the name of Joan Crawford Fairbanks. She was divorced last year from Douglas Fairbanks Jr. The witnesses were Leopold Friedman and M. M. Schenck, both executives of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in New York, says the New York Times.

Several theatrical friends of both bride and bridegroom were present at the ceremony. Miss Crawford gave her age as 26 and Mr. Tone gave his as 30. His home is in Niagara Falls and he was graduated from Cornell University in 1927.

Friend of Groom

Mayor Jenkins said that Miss Crawford wore a dark blue sports ensemble and that Mr. Tone was attired in a gray-striped business suit. He said he was an old friend of Mr. Tone's and that the wedding had been "scheduled previously." The wedding ring, he said, was white gold, set with emeralds and diamonds.

After the ceremony the party left for the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria in New York, where Miss Crawford and Mr. Tone had been stopping since their recent arrival from Los Angeles.

Cornell Graduate

Franchot Tone has been connected with the theater since his college days at Cornell. He was president of the Dramatic Club as well as the Phi Betta Kappa Chapter at Cornell, and after a Summer in France at the University of Rennes he was with a stock company in Buffalo. He appeared in "The Belt" in Greenwich Village and later was in the "Age of Innocence" with Katharine Cornell. He has appeared in Theater Guild companies and was one of the original members of the Group Theater.

His first talking picture role was with Joan Crawford in "Today We Live." His father is Frank J. Tone, president of the Carborundum Company.

Was Chicago Dancer

Miss Crawford, a native of San Antonio Texas, made her stage debut as a dancer in Chicago after she had left home against her family's wishes. She entered films as an extra in 1925 and has since been featured in many productions.

Miss Crawford and Mr. Tone returned to the East from Hollywood together early this month. Mr. Tone admitted he had proposed, but said he had not yet been accepted. They had been seen together frequently in the film capitol.

At the Waldorf-Astoria last night the bridegroom said he "did not want any more publicity," but that they were very happy.

United States Asks For Bids On Housing Plans

during construction. It is estimated the building work will create pay rolls of more than $38,000,000 for direct labor.

"In addition, the production and fabrication of building materials for this program will create some 52,000,000 man-hours of work, releasing the sum of $30,000,000 in pay rolls."

Besides the Federal projects, construction is practically complete on seven limited dividend housing projects for which P.W.A. loans totaling $12,641,600 were made. All these projects are occupied.

Beats October 22 Deadline

In a communication to Harold L. Ickes, administrator, Mr. Clas said: "The housing division is glad to report that all of its projects, with the exception of the Schenectady development, approved only October 17, have been put out for bids. This means that the housing division has not only met the works-relief October 22 deadline, but has actually beaten it by days."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

New England is California

During one of his piratical expeditions, undertaken to harass the Spanish shipping trade, Sir Francis Drake, commanding the "Golden Hynde", being unable to return to England by the route he came, decided to return by way of the Pacific.

On June 17, 1579, Sir Francis landed in what is now called Drake's Bay just north of San Francisco, California. In the name of Queen Elizabeth he took possession of California, and named the country Nova Albion (New England) for its white banks and cliffs, reminding him of Old England. He spent 36 days in the new country, whose hospitality and kindliness he enjoyed, but for many centuries thereafter the English atlases and geographical works continued to refer to California as Nova Albion, as Drake had christened it.

Scotch Code

A Scotsman had to send an urgent telegram, and not wishing to spend more money than necessary wrote like this:

"Bruises hurt erased afford erected analysis hurt too infectious dead."

(Ten words.)

The Scotsman who received it immediately decided it was: "Bruce is hurt. He raced a Ford. He wrecked it, and Alice is hurt, too. In fact she's dead." (Nineteen words.)—Boston Evening Trancript.

Every Well a Filling-Station

A Texas inventor thinks he will soon be able to run an automobile on water alone. Meanwhile, it wouldn't be such a bad scheme if the drivers tried out the idea on themselves.—Boston Herald.

Spanish Painter Wins '35 Carnegie Institute's Prize

Canvas Showing Wistful South American Negro Couple Selected As Best

First prize of $1000 in the 1935 Carnegie Institute International Exhibition of Paintings was won at the opening at Pittsburgh on October 17 by Hipolito Hidalgo de Caviedes of Madrid for his "Elvira and Tiberio." It shows a wistful South American Negro couple, posed as in an old daguerreo type, says the Christian Science Monitor.

Second prize of $600 was awarded to an American artist, Charles E. Burchfield of Gardenville, N. Y. The painting is entitled "The Shed in the Swamp."

Third prize of $500 went to Henry Mattson of Woodstock, N. Y., for his painting, "Deep Water."

Four Honorable Mentions

First honorable mention, which carries a prize of $400, was awarded to Albert Saverys of Belgium for his painting "Still Life." Second honorable mention with a prize of $300 went to Candido Portinari, a Brazilian, for his painting "Coffee." Per Deberitzz of Oslo, Nork., was given third honorable mention with a prize of $200 for his paintng "Sun and Sea." The fourth honorable mention with a prize of $100 went to Sergius Pauser of Vienna for his painting "Austrian Landscape."

The Allegheny County Garden Club prize of $300, offered by the Garden Club of Allegheny County for the best painting of flowers or a garden, was awarded to the distinguished French artist, Maurice de Vlaminck, for his painting entitled "Flowers."

Jury Exclusively of Artists

This year the Carnegie Institute returned to its former practice of a jury of award composed entirely of artists. There were three European and three American members of the jury. They were Alexander Brook of New York, John Steuart Curry of Westport, Conn.; Colin Gill of London, Jonas Lie of New York, Henrik Lund of Oslo, Norway, and Isidore Opsomer of Antwerp, Belgium. Homer Sant-Gaudens, director of fine arts, Carnegie Institute, was the chairman of the jury. The jury met in Pittsburgh on Sept. 25 and 26.

More nations are represented in this year's international than ever before in its history. Twenty-one nations have contributed groups of paintings. Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Mexico are represented for the first time.

365 Paintings Exhibited

There are 365 paintings in the 1935 International. Of this total, 276 are by foreign and 87 by American artists. In all there are 334 artists—247 foreign and 87 American—represented. The nations contributing to the exhibition are: United States, Great Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, Argentina, Chile, Brazil, Mexico, Canada, Norway, Sweden, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Ninety-three artists are making their initial appearance in a Carnegie International this year. Special interest centers in this year's exhibition because during the time of the show, the Carnegie Institute will celebrate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Andrew Carnegie, the founder of the International.

Winner Born in Madrid

Hipolito Hidalgo de Caviedes, the Spanish artist, was born in Madrid in 1902. He studied with his father, who is a sculptor. He traveled for two years in Italy and Germany. He had a one-man exhibition in the Salon of the Friends of Art in Madrid in 1929. He exhibited first in this country with a group of Spanish artists in New York in 1927 and in 1930 he exhibited in the National Exhibition of Fine Arts in Madrid. In 1929 he was awarded a silver medal at the Seville Exposition for his mural decorations. He is represented by a portrait in the Madrid Museum of Modern Art. He first exhibited at the Carnegie International in 1931.

Painting Done in Haste

The painting which won first prize, "Elvira and Tiberio," is a decorative, sensitive, novel in its color scheme, and modern in conception. It shows a young South American Negro couple, all dressed up with apparently no place to go. They are seated on an empire sofa, and are posed stiffly. It demonstrates that the artist is very personal in the treatment of his subject, refreshing, original, and a master of drawing. The canvas was pointed this summer, and the artist had to rush it to America without having had an opportunity to varnish it.

American Wins Second

Charles E. Burchfield, the American artist who won second prize, was born in Ashtabula Harbor in 1893. He studied at the Cleveland School of Art from 1912 to 1916. He was awarded first prize for water color in the Cleveland Society of Artists in 1921. He won the Penton Medal for water color at the Cleveland Museum the same year, and in 1929 the Jennie Sesnam Gold Medal at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. He is represented in a number of important museums in the United States. He has exhibited in Carnegie Internationals since 1927, and served on the American Committee of Selection for the 1930 International.

Paints in Water Color

The picture with which he won the second prize is, as practically all his work, in water color. Yet, because of the way he handles his medium and because of the size of his pictures, the beholder always thinks of them as oil paintings. While still a young man, he is a pioneer in the now ever-increasing school of artists, who paint the American scene. He is an artist of force and originality. His work is rich in quality, and he has an especially fine feeling for light and space. The Carnegie Award is the most important one he has received so far in his career.

Henry E. Mattson of Woodstock, N. Y., who won the third prize, was born in Sweden in 1887, but came to this country when very young. While working as a mechanic in Worcester Mass., he took up the study of painting. He attended for a time the school of the Worcester Art Museum. In 1916 he went to Woodstock to study landscape painting under John Carlson, and from that time he has been a prominent member of the famous Woodstock Colony. He was awarded the Harris Silver Medal and prize of $500 at the annual exhibition of the Art Institute of Chicago in 1931, and the third Clark Prize of $1000 at the fourteenth biennial exhibition at the Corcoran Gallery of Art this year.

In Several Galleries

He is represented in the Phillips Memorial Gallery, in the Whitney Museum of American Art, in several municipal galleries, and in private collections. He first exhibited in a Carnegie International in 1927. Mattson's paintings, as demonstrated so clearly in his prize-winning canvas, are highly individual and profoundly simple.

Immediately after the close of the exhibition in Pittsburgh, the entire foreign section will be shown in Cleveland at the Cleveland Museum of Art from January 2 to February 14, 1936, and in Toledo at the Toledo Museum of Art from March 7 to April 18, 1936. Under the terms of Andrew Carnegie's gift of that institute to the city of Pittsburgh, the exhibition is always "Free to the People."

Can League Redistribute Mandates, Asks Lothian

anarchy to drive all nations into military alliances for their own security is making the success of an isolationist policy more and more problematical.

Air Power Alters Security

On the one hand air power is transforming the problem of security. Nations can no longer be indifferent to the results of other nations' quarrels whch may result in the transfer of territory involving menace to themselves, or the closing of markets detrimental to their own prosperity.

On the other hand there is the moral factor. Despite the strength of nationalism more and more individuals are beginning to feel that the interests of humanity are one and that they cannot remain indifferent or neutral about manifest barbarism or wrong. Under the influence of press and radio this consideration, as the Ethiopian case shows, is creating a public opinion which practical statesmen cannot ignore.

The third school of peace opinion, the school of collective action against war, adheres to the basic principles underlying the Covenant of the League of Nations and the Kellogg Pact. They believe that while mankind may be a long way from that world federation which is the only ultimate solution of the war problem, the practical choice today is between a drift back to international anarchy, steadily increasing armaments, the alliance system over mounting tariffs and unemployment, inevitably exploding before very long in a world war worse than the last, and a system in which, by collective action, nations can be protected against unprovoked aggression.

Under this action changes can be made in treaties by pacific means, armaments can be reduced to a minimum, and the present drift toward war reversed into steady progress toward peace.

After enduring a grievous series of rebuffs this school has now gained fresh heart from the stand just taken by Great Britain at Geneva, against Italian aggression in Ethiopia. Faced, as it clearly was by the Italian policy, with the inexorable alternatives either of declaring that it could not undertake to live up to its obligations under the Covenant because several great powers had withdrawn from the League, or of formally declaring that it was willing to fulfill these obligations if all other members would do so also, Britain decided, without equivocation, for the second course. As a result the collective system is being put to a crucial test which will determine whether it is the road along which mankind must travel in its search for peace.

Power in Sanctions

It is now clear that the moral force of world opinion is not enough to restrain the aggressor, that as in the case first of Japan in Manchuria, then of Bolivia and Paraguay in South America and now of Italy in Africa, national feeling once aroused will ignore world opinion, unless that opinion is backed by force.

If the League is to be able to restrain aggression by a great power, or what is equally important, to do so without extending a local conflict into a general war between highly-organized states, it will be because its members are able to mobilize against him "sanctions" whether economic or military, which like police action within the state, are certainly and inevitably irresistible.

But another aspect of the collective system is becoming not less clear. Not only must it be able to defeat quickly and easily unprovoked aggression, it must be able to bring about adequately and in time the changes in the political and economic map of the world which are necessary if all nations are to have a reasonable "place in the sun." Otherwise there will be no relaxation of armaments.

It is now manifest that mere revision of the peace treaties will not be enough. The real issue which confronts the world is how to deal with those barriers to trade and migration which are producing such violent explosive forces in so many countries today.

Barriers to Trade

The root of the present crisis is not in Ethiopia at all but in the damming up of populations and unemployed workers and farmers behind insurmountable barriers to movement in a world which is shrinking every day in terms of time and space.

If any collective system is to work it must be able to lower the tariffs, embargoes, quotas and other restrictions on international trade. It must be able to deal with problems of migration. It must be able to reconsider the attribution of colonies transferred at the end of the war, provided the new mandatories accept membership of the League and its supervision in the interest of the native peoples. It must consider the possibility of the "open door" in the colonial possessions of all countries.

If the collective system can achieve these ends, can prove itself capable of resisting aggression and of effecting justly and in time political and economic change, it will have proved that it alone is that way along which mankind can advance to its ardently desired goal of the ending of war.

Fooling The Seagulls

Seagulls following ocean liners seldom must flap their wings, and can remain in the air for hours by merely spreading their wings and riding the air currents created by the speed of the liner. But with the new streamlined "Kalakala", plying across Puget Sound, it is different. The air currents close in around this vessel so rapidly and perfectly that if a gull wishes to pursue the ship, it must continually flap its wings or fall into the water.

First Journalist Student

Homer Croy, well known author, was the first student in the first school of journalism in the world, but he never took up journalism. Mr. Croy says he slipped and became a novelist.

The first school of journalism was founded at the University of Missouri with Dean Walter Williams, who died recently, as the head of the department. Mr. Croy was its first student, 1908.

"Escape Me Never" with Elizabeth Bergner and Hugh Sinclair

Elizabeth Bergner, the tiny star of "Escape Me Never," directed by her husband, Paul Czinner, and released by United Artists at the Hibiya Gekijo, November 13-19, is said to be the peer of Bernhardt and Duse. She won great success in London and New York in the play of the same name by Margaret Kennedy, written especially for her. The picturisation of the drama will now be seen in Tokyo. Playing opposite to the star is Hugh Sinclair, the English actor, who is frequently seen on the New York stage. Leon Quartermaine of the London stage is also in the picture. Penelope Dudley Ward, the daughter of the Rt. Hon. William Dudley Ward, Privy Councillor and the Hon. Mrs. Dudley Ward, makes her film debut in this picture.

The story which takes Gemma from Venice, over the Dolomites and to London, follows the sometimes-gay, sometimes-tragic tale of the waif, whom the penniless Sebastian found wandering about Venice, starving, with her new-born son and gave shelter. Complications develop, however, when Sebastian meets his brother's aristocratic sweetheart, Fenella and falls in love wth her. Gemma returns to London but he follows and marries her. While she works as a slavey to support him so that he may finish his ballet, he again takes up his romance with Fenella. The death of the baby and the success of the ballet bring about a tender reconciliation between Gemma and Sebastian, however, and the film ends on an unforgettably touching note.

Bergner was born in Vienna and was trained for three years at the Conservatoire before playing her first stage role at 14. She made her debut as Ophelia in Zurich, and subsequently triumphed playing other Shakespearean heroines.

While still very young she became one of Max Reinhardt's stars in Berlin and under the brilliant producer established a reputation which caused critics to dust off the superlatives which had been in moth balls since the passing of those great ladies of the stage already mentioned.

On the English stage she scored in such diverse roles as "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," Shaw's "St Joan," which she plans to make into a film in the near future, and "The Constant Nymph" by the author of "Escape Me Never," which was especially written for Bergner as a sequel to the earlier triumph.

Bergner's film career began in the silent days when Germany was turning out some fine artistic products, but it was begun much against her will. Indeed it was largely due to the enthusiasm of Paul Czinner, her director and now her husband, who foresaw her tremendous screen possibilities that she entered this medium which she believed unsuited to her talents. Despite the fact that her first film was not a success, Czinner persuaded her to continue, and under his direction she scored some brilliant successes. He has directed all her pictures, including "Nju," "The Violinist of Florence," "Love," and "Fraulein Else," during the silent era, and "Dreaming Lips," "Ariane," "Catherine the Great" and the current "Escape Me Never," since the inception of the talking screen.

Alberta's Social Credit System Is Nothing New

So Says 'Review' Of National City Bank Of New York In Discussing Plan

The province of Alberta, Western Canada, has had a social convulsion which in fact is an economic reaction from an unhealthful "boom" period, promoted by stimulants, such as subsidized railroad-building, subsidized colonizing, subsidized transportation by lakes and Hudson Bay, subsidized publicity, and other political policies, all prompted by a laudable desire to settle the country, and besides the subsidies there were abnormally high prices for farm products, resulting from the War. Settlers poured in upon semi-arid plains, where good crops of wheat were under favorable weather conditions, but everything depended on wheat.

The War had stimulated wheat production wherever grown outside of Europe. It had cut off Russian exports to western Europe. Acreage doubled in Canada, Argentina and Australia and greatly increased in the United States, aided by the invention of the combined harvester and thresher, and the shift from spring sowings to winter sowings in the semi-arid regions. When the war ended, and Europe regained normal production, European governments restricted overseas imports to preserve their markets to home producers, surpluses piled up and prices fell. The governments of the United States and Canada sought to support the price, but the law of supply and demand was relentless and the governments were forced to admit defeat. They could not buy a flood of wheat which the markets did not want. Their well-meant efforts were misleading to producers.

Break in Wheat Prices

With the break of more than one-half in wheat prices, other farm products gave way also and farmers everywhere were in trouble; but the conditions were especially difficult for the new settlers in Alberta, dependent upon one crop, and that affected not only by low prices but drought. Conditions of this kind are harrowing; an upset of the economic balance disturbs the market balance also. All of the conditions are not within the view of the individual farmer, and among the explanations made to him was the insidious one that he was the victim of various conspiracies concocted in the markets and centers of finance. Resort to political action was advised.

The "Liberal" party was in power in Alberta in 1921, when the first big drop in wheat prices came, the Conservative party never having had much show there; but the Liberal party was promptly smashed by the United Farmers party, which rose up spontaneously, and swept everything before it. The United Farmers have been in charge of everything since 1921, but in an election on August 22nd last, it suffered a defeat as ignominious as that which it administered to the Liberals in 1921, a new party called the "Social Credit" party carrying fifty-six legislative seats out of sixty-three in all.

New Prophet and Leader

A new prophet and leader had arisen, William Aberhart, a school teacher and Bible class leader, who is said to have unusual facility in mingling scriptural phrases with economics. As his fluency has developed, and he has felt the stimulus of larger audiences, he has climbed into the realms of finance and statesmanship with the above-mentioned results. He has taken up with a certain "social credit" scheme, promoted in England by a certain Major Douglas, who claims to have thought it all out himself, although there is nothing in it that is not at least as old as the French assignats of 1790-96.

All such schemes are developed around the kernel of truth so often emphasized in these columns, says the "Review" of the National City Bank of New York, that all business consists of exchanging services, which in other words means that products and services really pay for each other in the markets, and that if production is kept in balance and prices in right relations to each other, there will be full employment for everybody and the highest possible standard of living. This is the fundamental principle of the existing economic system as taught by economic science. The problem of prosperity consists in keeping production in balance and prices in reciprocal relations, and war inevitably throws the system into great disorder.

Political Control

Neither Douglas nor any of the new money or social doctors of the present generation have contributed a new idea to the problem. They offer nothing but political control over production and prices, and a government clearing system in place of bank clearings, of which 430 are in daily operation in the United States, accomplishing the settlements between the several sections and the numerous groups of the system. They offer no plans for keeping the system in balance that are not childish in comparison with the law of supply and demand. No government authority can control prices unless its policies conform to the law of supply and demand, but unfortunately government control is invariably invoked for the purpose of obstructing and nullifying the law of supply and demand.

It is true that extraordinary conditions may arise, when Government control or assistance may be temporarily serviceable for obtaining prompt coordination, (as in war time) but always the nursing bottle is wanted indefinitely and usually backed up by political organization.

Misguided Sincerity

Th sincerity and good puropses of Douglas and Aberhart need not be questioned, but thye are misguided by the notion that the bankers make great profits by substituting their credit for money, and that if the Government did this a great "unearned increment" would inure to the public. What they do not understand is that banking is done in only small part upon bank capital and credit, but upon the combined credit of all the people who use banking service. They do not understand that banking service is mutual and cooperative, conducted at heavy expense, and requiring trained and competent management. In short, its requirements are about as far as possible from the proper field of political governments.

It is an old saying that the best proof of the pudding is in the eating, and this is true of all social and economic experiments, although they may be costly. The "social credit" policy has received much publicity and probably Alberta, which stretches from the United States to the Arctic circle and beyond, affords as good conditions for trying it as any place. It has plenty of room for "subsistence homesteads," as well as for the primitive pursuits of hunting and fishing. With 125,000,000 people to be placed and cared for, the United States presents greater difficulties for such an undertaking. However, the Alberta experiment will be followed with interest.

Capone Gang Used 'Big Business' Plan

Beer Syndicate Aides Had Titles Such As 'Financial Secretary'

The United States Treasury certified an income tax assessment of $120,000 against Al Capone and fourteen confederates, on October 18. In connection with the action, the Department of Justice revealed details of the investigation on the basis of which it recommended the assessment a month ago.

This investigation showed, according to Joseph Lawrence, Administrator of the Taxes and Penalties Unit of the Department of Justice, that the Capone gang had a prohibitionera beer organization in Chicago which functioned in the manner of big business in the legitimate world, according to the New York Times.

"It was revealed," Mr. Lawrence said, "that these alleged conspirators had regular titles similar to those held by men in legitimate industry. For instance, reports show Joseph Fusco was the general manager and purchasing agent for the syndicate for trucks and beer-making equipment. Jack Guzik was financial secretary and in charge of operations in the absence of Capone. Hyman Levine was the collector for the syndicate. Steve Swoboda was the brewmaster. Frank Juffra was chief-in-charge of work transportation. Albert Johnson was Chicago beer-truck driver and special convoy man, and Nicholas Juffra was organizer and president of the World Motor Service Company, which did practically all of the trucking for the syndicate."

Would Fill 8,000,000 Glasses

The scope of this huge bootlegging enterprise was indicated by Mr. Lawrence by saying:

"If all the barrels of beer the government is now assessing in this case were laid end to end, they would make a line over twelve miles long and could supply one full glass of the beverage to almost 8,000,000 people."

The evidence is the outgrowth of the biggest beer raid made during prohibition. It brought in seventy-seven loaded trucks and all the beer on hand in seventeen breweries.

In discussing the evidence Mr. Lawrence declared:

"It is reported that Capone used the name of Al Brown and thirteen other aliases during his long reign in Chicago. The majority of the conspirators in the syndicate had several aliases and one, John J Nolan, had thirty-one.

"There are indications that certain sign painters must have thirved during the reign of the beer baron and his henchmen. The large fleet of trucks used in the traffic would be painted one time, for example, 'World Motor Service Company,' then be changed to 'Donald Transportation and Hauling Service, then be changed again to 'Big Load Motor Service,' &c. And it was a common thing for Federal agents to find large 'vacant' and 'for rent' signs painted on buildings in which illicit breweries were being operated at full blast day and night.

"It is learned that the syndicate often used as many as four armed convoy cars to protect their beer shipments from hi-jackers, as there was no end of double-crossing."

Let the Gang Do the Work

After one seizure, Mr. Lawrence added, the government received a tip that the gang would return Sunday to cart away the equipment. The government guards, Mr. Lawrence went on, watched until the gang "had all the equipment nicely loaded on their truck, at which time another arrest was made for violation of the criminal code, in removing seized government property.

Proceeding, Mr. Lawrence said:

"The records indicate that Nicholas and Frank Juffra were pretty much in control of the syndicate in its early days, but later Capone became the real power, aided by Fusco and Delaney. Capone was in the beer racket for about ten years and was virtual czar for over five years. He directed the traffic from his headquarters in a Chicago hotel and from his mansion in Miami.

"The old records indicate that among the nicknames of Capone and his henchmen were the following: Snorky, Bragger, Scarface, Big Fellow, Rusty, Dutch, Little Jack, Greasy Thumb and Loudmouth Hymie.

"The record also shows that printed copies of the license numbers of all automobiles driven by government agents were found in the possession of one of the alleged conspirators. These were printed for distribution to the members and employes of the syndicate, with instructions to 'be on their guard'."

PEERESSES' SCHOOL HAS 50 ANNIVERSARY

One of the most important social events of November for prominent members of Japanese society is the 50th anniversary of the Peeresses' school, which is now being held. The celebration which opened last Tuesday, will continue through Monday.

The school was founded on November 13, 1886 when Her Majesty the Empress Shoken attended the inauguration ceremony. It was she who suggested the school and it was through her personal interest and efforts, that the institution materialized.

For half a century, daughters of the nobility and Imperial Princesses have received their education in this institution.

On last Tuesday, Nov. 12, about 770 students and 100 instructors were conducted by Mr. Junji Nagaya, President of the school, to the Meiji Shrine to pay respects. T. I. H. Princesses Teru, Masako Kuni, Asako Kuni, Michiko Kaya, Kiyoko Asaka Tayeko Kitashirakawa, also visited the shrine with this group.

International Air Control Needed; Efficacy Doubted

a safeguard against possible misuse of civil aviation, but for the positive task of war prevention.

The coming of aviation has indeed pointed the way to a solution of humanity's problem which was beyond the horizon of the makers of the Covenant. For in the particular case of the air arm, the transfer of this formidable arsenal of power from competing national authorities to a single central authority is perfectly feasible in Europe—on the evidence of the experts working in connection with the air commission at Geneva; and such a transfer would remove the main cause of fear which holds up all disarmaments.

Impelled by Germany

With a weapon of such potential destructiveness, parity at zero is the only effective policy of peace. Any attempt at mere limitation of relative strengths is like playing jackstraws on a powder barrel. German rearmament has induced the British Government to take a new positive attitude toward the League Covenant and its responsibilities in Europe which may well transform the whole political situation.

The difficulties of the League in the Italo-Ethiopian affair, have demonstrated the unsatisfactory nature of the existing machinery for sanctions. Policing action, which this and similar situations demand, is essentially preventive and not punitive. Its principles are impartiality, promptitude, and the employment of a minimum of force.

In the air arm we have an up-to-date instrument for policing in the normal sense of the term, i. e. action by way of restraint before a breach of the public peace. Expedients like the "Air Locarno" take no account of the factor of civil aviation."

Suited to Patrolling

It may or may not be true that the air arm is useless by itself for war operations. As an up-to-date policing instrument for example, the suggestion for sending out air police units to patrol the Ethiopian frontiers, prior to Italy's aggression—it has obvious potentialities. Even today, few people appreciate the very special policing and patrolling functions which aircraft, under international supervision, are able to perform.

If air power be centralized, individual naval and land forces may safely be left in national hands. They may be called in to reinforce the police if necessary (under Article 16 of the Covenant) as in the civil community, but normally the air squads will have successfully done their job of war prevention.

The nucleus of the special European authority within the framework of the League is to be found in the Committee for the Federal Union of Europe, M. Briand's legacy to Geneva, which still subsists.

But this is not the place to go into details of organization. Suffice it to say that:

1. A European air service must be a combined police and transport monopoly.

2. The sphere of its operation is defined positively by the area over which it can exercise effective guardianship (thus Soviet Russia would remain outside a European scheme, though in close co-operation), and negatively by the range of the air bomber (which means the inclusion of the United Kingdom, but not of the British Dominions).

3. While for air transport, airports and repair bases must be available in practically all the states constituting the European authority, air police contingents normally will be distributed in accordance with the recognized policing fundamental, i. e., in places where trouble may be expected. They will act under standing orders to prevent or check armed trespass.

4. The personnel of an international air police would be mainly recruited by individual enlistment. But at the beginning, presumably, members of existing national air forces would be given the option of a transfer or retirement. When such a force is in being, the persons called upon "to fight in any part of the world in support of the League" will be only such as have enlisted for the purpose because they liked the profession of flying. The responsibility of any nation will be limited to keeping its Government up to scratch, the Governments having, one and all, accepted the policing fundamental when they signed the Covenant.

5. So long as states continue heavily armed the police cannot dispense with the bombing weapon as a last argument (a European air police as proposed will, of course, be replacing national air forces and will not exist in addition to them) but as a policing instrument it can be used discriminately. It is justifiable on humanitarian grounds against an invading force after warnings, and less drastic measures have proved ineffective. Conceivably the chemists will soon provide some heavy liquid gas having a powerful soporific effect upon its victims without doing them any lasting injury.

Russian Thefts Lead To Many Executions

trade in the Russian Federated Republic during 1934 lost 45,000,000 rubles through theft, and in the city of Voronesh the loss from theft to state cooperative trading organizations has averaged in 1935 more than 9,000,000 rubles annually, compared with 8,000,000 rubles in 1934 and 7,500,000 in 1933.

The Soviet press deplores not only widespread corruption, but also "speculation," which would not be taken so seriously elsewhere, since it appears to be little more than shrewd private trading. A large number of individuals have stoutly resisted the state's efforts to gain control of the entire national economy. More than 2 per cent of individual peasants have managed to cling to their land, and the press reports that obstinate petty traders also have managed to organize "false" producers' cooperatives, which mask individual enterprise under an outward cooperative form.

Husband Talks In Sleep, Alimony Awarded Wife

Charles Witzel of New York City, purchasing agent for the Third Avenue Railway Company, talked endearingly of a young woman in his sleep, providing his wife, Margaret, with part basis for a separation suit, it was disclosed recently when Supreme Court Justice William F. Bleakley allowed her temporary alimony of $50 weekly.

In the Fall of 1927, said Mrs. Witzel in her affidavit, she overheard her husband speak during the night the words, "Yes, you're my sweetheart. I keep my sweetheart's picture over my heart."

Mrs. Witzel alleges that she investigated later and found that her husband did carry the photo of a 27-year-old office employe over his heart, says the New York Times.

The couple were married in 1904 and have two grown daughters, Edna M. Witzel and Ruth E. Yahn. No date has been set for trial of the separation action.

competition from Europe.

Schedules Abroad Speeded

European airlines, both French and German, have speeded schedules and offer double the American air service available in eastern South America. In the same period, indicating the increasing use of air service in the trade war, all traffic over Pan American lines has grown nearly 45 per cent, some 78 per cent of this traffic being commercial.

To provide the needed facilities the airline has effected improvements in hotel accommodations at all overnight stops on its routes. At points which will be such stops under the new schedules, construction of modern airway hotels has been arranged or annexes to existing hotels have been modernized to handle the traffic.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Last Two Stones in England

High up on a pointed bluff stretching out into the Atlantic from the mainland of England, are two rugged, sea-battered stones which are familiarly known as the "Last two stones in England," for the reason that they are situated on the westernmost point of the English mainland, at Lands End, Cornwall. But to ocean travellers from America, they are the "first two stones in England," since that point is the first land sighted after leaving American shores.

Ethiopian Envoy's Sons Cheered On Way To War

Owing to the pressure of work, the Ethiopian Minister to London, Dr. A. W. C. Martin, was unable to see off his sons, Benjamin and Joseph, when they left Victoria Station, on October 17 en route for Ethiopia, to join the forces of Emperor Haile Selassie.

A large crowd, including the secretaries of the Ethiopian Legation, cheered the young adventurers as the train left, says the New York Times.

A few moments before the departure, three small brothers and one sister dashed up the platform to say farewell to their elder brothers.

One of the smallest boys amused the crowd by shouting shrilly:

"I want to go to war."

Dr. Martin's two elder sons are trained engineers and also have been learned to fly at the Brooklands Airdrome. They hope to serve in the Ethiopian air force.

Unprepared

The golfer had lost his ball, and, not unnaturally, was inclined to be annoyed with his caddie.

"Why didn't you watch where it went?" he asked.

"Well, sir," said the boy, "it don't usually go anywhere, and so it took me unprepared like."—Pearson's Weekly (London).

Liner Olympic Gives Work To 350 Wreckers

Town Of Jarrow To Be Provided With £100,000 In Wages Over 15 Months Period

Between 300 and 400 unemployed men in Jarrow are to find work in breaking up the Olympic, 47,000-ton Cunard-White Star liner, and the tenth largest boat in the world. It is estimated that this distressed town in Durham will be provided with work to the value of £100,000 in wages over a period of 12 to 15 months, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Sir John Jarvis, former High Sheriff of Surrey, is responsible for this transaction. Sir John bought the Olympic for £100,000 and immediately resold it to a Sheffield machinery and steel-works firm on condition that it should be taken to Jarrow to be broken up.

Jarrow 'Adopted'

This is one of the biggest ship-breakings jobs that has ever been undertaken in this country. The River Tyne is being dredged to enable the liner to get alongside the town wharves.

A year ago Sir John, when High Sheriff of Surrey, undertook to "adopt" the town of Jarrow—described as "the worst hit town in the country," where three out of every four men were unemployed—on behalf of Surrey, in order to help to lift it out of its deplorable position.

Sir John immediately commenced work by moving 500 people from rat-infested hovels into 100 respectable cottages in another part of Jarrow, where they paid exactly the same rent.

Building New Industries

Te encouraged them to decorate their own homes. The people of Surrey provided money for purchase of materials. He initiated schemes for laying out a public park, a sports-ground, a children's playground and a swimming bath. Opportunities were provided for the growing of foodstuffs in gardens and allotments and a factory for manufacturing furniture was started.

But Sir John meant to go much further than this. He said at the time: "Jarrow will have to rebuild its fortunes on the basis of new industry—furniture-making, glass bottle and ship-breaking." He sent young men to other parts of the country to learn trades, and a short time ago he bought a small ship to be broken up at Jarrow as an experiment.

Encouraged by the success of this experiment he has now bought the Olympic, and has thus set in motion the wheels of a ship-breaking industry in Jarrow.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Stilled Honeymoon Express

Seventeen years ago, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Porter were married, and as the happy bride and groom of only a few hours started on their honeymoon, Mr. Porter took the baggage to the car in the side driveway of their home. Mrs. Porter, on entering the car, found him dead. So great was her sorrow that she has never allowed a person to touch or move the auto, and to this day it still stands in the driveway of the Lakeshore Drive home, Evanston, Ill., where Mrs. Porter left it, enclosed by a fence to insure the carrying out of the widow's wishes.

Freeing Ethiopian Slaves Proves Mammoth Task

street, Mihail's hirelings seized Abainich and carried her away in an automobile. No trace of her was to be found and it seemed certain that her slavery had begun.

Foreigner Got Action

The Armenian protested to the antislavery bureau in the capital and described the whole case to the judge. Being one of the many Armenians here under French protection, he made full use of that fact and threatened to bring the affair to the attention of the French press unless Abainich was found and released. Ethiopia is very sensitive to charges regarding the existence of slavery here, and the stealing of this girl was especially flagrant, since she had complete right, according to the law, to be free and the man who claimed her had a European education.

So the anti-slavery bureau used far more haste and vigor than is customary in this country and Abainich was soon found. She was placed in the custody of the antislavery judge himself, who kept her in his house and she was helped from a fund maintained by the Emperor for slaves seeking freedom. Her case dragged on for more than six months, for the man who claimed her did everything possible to win his case at court. Especially he brought pressure to bear on the girl's mother so as to make her tell the judge that Abainich's father was a slave, which would deprive the girl of the right to be free. The ignorant and defenseless mother was completely in his power, but refused to yield. She was subjected to privation, starvation, chains and torture, but defiantly told her owner that whatever he did she would testify that her daughter had a right to freedom.

And she stuck to that decision. Mihail, in spite of all his wiles, could get the case deferred no longer, and the court unanimously declared the girl free. It went further even and announced that if the young man dared molest her further, he would be severely punished as a slave dealer.

With great joy Abainich returned to the family of the Armenian, in whose office I found her some two years later. She is still careful never to go onto the street alone.

"And where is your heroic mother?" I asked, after I had heard her story.

Waletu's voice was full of sorrow as she said: "She is in my new name. When the court pronounced me free, I received another name. I chose it myself. And I picked Waletu, not because of its sound, but because it means 'suffering for another.'"

OPENS BOOK SHOP

Miss Miriam Phelps, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Phelps, recent residents of Tokyo, has opened an interesting book shop, "Tory Row," at 44 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Miss Phelps after her graduation from college spent some years in Tokyo, and was known for her literary ability. Her new enterprise in partnership with Miss Agnes C. Foote, is in keeping with her taste and scholarly accomplishments.

The reason why the new book shop has been called "Tory Row" is given in the leaflet which announces the new place of business, as follows:

"Brattle Street has behind it a long tradition of stately homes with shaded lawns and well-stocked libraries, residences of people who loved good literature and established ways. Partriots of Revolutionary times dubbed it "Tory Row."

"In opening the Tory Row Bookshop we offer the booklovers of Cambridge a place where browsing quietly over the shelves or seated comfortably by the fireside, they may become familiar with the books which are now being offered to them by the various publishers.

"Our books include new fiction, biography, history, art reprints of older volumes, books for boys and girls approved by educators, and other more specialized subjects. We shall be glad to welcome you to the Tory Row Bookshop and to put at your disposal our information regarding the best new publications."
